Search for a super sec.

How is the Schools Council getting on in its search for a new super secretary? The job was advertised at the beginning of May and there were 50 firm applications by closing date last week. The council hopes to complete interviewing and announce an appointment by the end of this month.

Such a brisk timetable for a job of this importance to the Schools Council's future suggests a certain confidence that the right man is within their grasp. However, as the deadline approached, not everyone with the council's interests at heart shared this optimism. The main worry was whether the salary level had been pitched high enough—at £13,000—to attract the right candidate.

This school of thought believes that they need a successful CEO—perhaps Dudley Fiske or Peter Newsam—or a senior man from the DES. Philip Halsey, Under-Secretary with the schools curriculum brief, might have the right sort of qualifications, particularly as he was once a headmaster and has done a previous stint at the council. But anyone like these three gentlemen would be learning at least the going price already.

And would any of them want the job? It is true that there is no obvious promotion ladder once you have made it as CEO, and Dudley Fiske has already shown how he could toughen up the ailing Society of Education Officers since he became president, but Peter Newsam can hardly be restless yet.

An acceptable alternative might be a head who has had the invaluable experience of administering a large school, or the secretary of an exam board (at least one of them has applied) who could convince the other exam boards that the council means business.

What is crucial for the Schools Council is to find a heavyweight who can consolidate the rehabilitation of the council begun by Sir Alex Smith and now being led by John Tomlinson, his successor as chairman. After years of being sniped at from all sides and a near knock-out blow from the DES Yellow Book in 1976 with its indictments of mediocrity, the council began to feel it had been reprieved when the DES went to some trouble to secure the much-admired Tomlinson as chairman. That gave them one CEO, of course, but he still has Cheshire to run and can only be part-time.

The secretary will replace the three former short-service secretaries. He will have to make the new constitution work and help to guide those warring factions into a body that can face up to the work on exams and curriculum ahead, and justify the council's continued existence.

It is a daunting prospect which will require dedication as much as the right salary level. Perhaps that is why the advertisement for the job said that suggestions of suitable people would be welcome as well as applications. That does leave the door open for drafting.

If at first you don't succeed

More news from the Schools Council, this time on the multi-racial front. Undeterred by the long catalogue of controversy stretching back to the Stenhouse race pack in 1972, and while the disputed chapters of this year's ill-fated project are still being rewritten by committee, the NUT has come up hopefully with yet another multi-racial project. It has not been greeted with universal acclaim.

John Bowdler, who was the NUT executive man on the council's consultative committee which handled the latest disputed project, insists that the new one is in no way intended to replace it. He just thinks it will be better.

The most obvious difference is that the new project is intended to cover 11-18 and 11-13 schools whereas the last one, Education for a multiracial society, covered curriculum and content for the 5-13 age group. The idea is to run a pilot project for the first year looking at current practice, with a three-year follow-up in the light of what is found.

However, the main reason for the NUT faith in it is that Professor Alan Little has been persuaded to direct the project, particularly since it is now the union's line that it was the constant changes in director which caused most of the trouble last time. Of the four directors Education in a multi-racial society went through, the first two—Bert Townsend and June Derek (who also had political differences with the team)—departed abroad; David Milner fell ill, and Dr Clare Burstall only took over during the closing stages.

The NUT approached Alan Little a few weeks ago to ask if he would be interested and if Goldsmiths' College, where he is Lewisham Professor of Social Administration, might house the project. He was interested "because I'm in agreement that more needs to be done in this area", and was due to meet the NUT this week to discuss plans.

Soundings are still going on and the Schools Council programme will discuss the project later this month. But, in spite of the respect widely felt about Alan Little's credentials for the job, there is by no means general support in the multi-racial lobby for the idea that a lot more time and money should be spent finding out what most of them know already. "The most appalling waste of money" was the reaction of ILEA's multiracial man Bev Woodruffe.

"They say it's better to fail with this board than pass with one of the others.

"The urgent thing is to get on with introducing multi-racial ideas across the curriculum", said Russell Profitt, West Indian deputy head of a Deptford primary school. "Time is running out if we are going to avoid an explosion. We can't afford to waste any more of it on research instead of action."

Circles close to freedom

The Department of Education and Science—a ministry which is not known for its great openness—could be forced radically to change its ways if the freedom of information campaigners get what they want. The idea that citizens should be given a right of access to Government files along North American or Swedish lines is not new, but it has taken a long time to gain currency here and is not much liked by civil servants.

In the House of Commons last month, it was revealed what subjects MPs are forbidden to ask questions about. The DES's list included "questions which infringed the proper exercise by other persons or bodies of responsibility vested in them, or which touch upon matters which are at the same time sub judice or subject to arbitration, answers which would involve a breach of confidence or security, and questions which would involve a disproportionate cost to secure the information requested".

Last weekend a group of academics pressure groups and journalists (note no bureaucrats) comprising what might now be called the Freedom of Information Industry got together to discuss a Bill which would allow some light to be shed on the darker corners of Elizabeth House.

There are thought to be four sets of proposals floating around for such a change in the law. Those the conference was discussing in a country house in Hertfordshire have been formulated by a Rowntree-backed organization, the Outer Circle Policy Unit, which is chaired by Mark Bonham-Carter. (The name derives from the unit's location in Regent's Park rather than from its position vis à vis inner circles of policy.)

OCPU is, anyway, rather inner circle or "mainstream" in its approach which made the debating fairly lively. The Bill came in for a lot of stick from the civil liberties contingent and others for being too limited in scope (local authorities are excluded), for the arrangements it laid down for people to challenge a refusal to disclose and for penalties for leaking material to be kept secret.

One of the ironies was that statements, discussion or recommendations of policy were excluded from disclosure in the Bill. This would mean a member of the public could not have access to the child benefits material leaked to Frank Field of the Child Poverty Action Group. Yet the OCPU project was set up in response to the child benefits storm to do something about Section 2 of the Official Secrets Act which hung over Mr Field's head for a while.

The unit's attempt to "rewrite" Section 2 of the Official Secrets Act arouses controversy anyway. Many in the FOI Industry would like to see the question of access to information treated quite separately from what is done about the leakers of classified information.

Another bill—a lot wider than OCPU's—which may also be fighting for Parliamentary support has been outlined by the Labour Party's national executive committee, specifically by Joe Jacob, an LSE law lecturer. Frances Morrell, Tony Benn's adviser and a former National Union of Students press officer, has thrown her weight behind it.

They were both at the conference together with Harry Street, law professor at Manchester, and Laurie Taylor, York's sociology professor. It was hard to remember amid the raging arguments that all of it was pie in the sky anyway. Any access Bill as opposed to a rewrite of the Secrets Acts would stand little chance of getting anywhere.

Hot seat gets hotter

People are on the move again at the Equal Opportunities Commission in Manchester. The education section is to lose Valerie Hale, who has been running the unit de facto since the Eileen Byrne fiasco. Dr Byrne, remember, was fired (partly on the grounds that she talked to a TES reporter), then reinstated but seconded to Brussels.

Dr Byrne is still nominally in charge of the section and Ms Hale is nominally acting head. (They have both been getting a principal's salary.) Her departure is seen as another tragedy for the EOC, particularly for the education section which has yet to show that it is doing very much— publicly.

A former teacher and one of younger generation of feminists these commission, Ms Hale quite different style from Dr B

Being young and, relatively inexperienced cannot helped her to influence Majesty's Inspectors or senior servants, but she was well those campaigning for a vigorous commission.

Her departure also comes inconvenient moment when number two, Mary Alexander taking time off to have a Hale could not comment reasons for going because off sick this week, but it is cult to see that she must self in an unenviable position

Anyone in that job would be careful not to offend of commissioners who have their susceptibilities over the case. She would also be an absentee boss and feel sure from feminists lobbying outside. It'll be a brave takes over a seat as hot

Chess

The fianchettoed King's Bishop: 3

I need make no apology for returning to this theme which is, indeed, one of the most important, as it is the most common, of all the many features of opening and middle-game play. In fact, a book could be written and that not a small one about this subject and perhaps some day I, or someone more competent than myself, will write such a book. The importance of this Bishop both as a weapon of attack for White and a means of defence and counter-attack by Black has been pretty clear right throughout the history of the game.

For White it represents an attack on the white squares and for Black, a counter-attack (or just simply an attack) on the black squares. In this last capacity it has become particularly prominent of recent years by its use in the King's Indian Defence.

There exists a curious paradox in this defence in that in nearly every case, Black masks this attack, or the pressure of his King's Bishop, by placing a pawn on K4 and a Knight on KB3. But in these cases the KP is really the spearhead of Black's attack and the KKt acquires increased importance through its tendency to move (perhaps to K5 or KKt5 or even KR4) and so launch a sudden but far from despicable attack.

An excellent example is the following game which was played in the Bucharest International Tournament this year and in which Black's counter-attack is in the hands of possibly the world's greatest expert on the use of the fianchettoed King Bishop, more particularly with the Black pieces.

White: P. Lukacs. Black: W. Uhlmann. QP Kings Indian Defence.

The tub-thumping of Messrs Rhodes Boyson and St John-Stevas produces a colourful vision of turned-back clocks—but does it bear any relation to policies likely to be introduced by a Conservative Government? page 5

Better luck this time with day release?

Speaking at the National Union of Teachers conference on the education and training of the 14-19 age group (page 9) Mrs. Williams said that the Government had decided to make the expansion of day release for young workers a top priority. She spoke of this as "the next big step forward", and referred to discussions now taking place with the Department of Employment.

While welcoming what looks like an important manifesto promise in the making, it is necessary to bear in mind the history of previous pledges on day release and temper enthusiasm with a certain scepticism. A direct promise to introduce "compulsory day release" was a 1974 election pledge. A [illegible] request to know what it meant got no answer from Labour Party headquarters, and after the election it was set aside without compunction.

Why? Because, as Mrs Williams has now conceded, there are very real difficulties which surface every time any Minister takes this one down and dusts it off. Mrs Williams wisely refrained from any promise (or threat) of "compulsory" day release because there are not the resources to carry it through—resources which would have to include the will to police such an obligation, and to take action against young workers who extended their truanting capacity to the FE stage. Everything points away from compulsion: who wants to incur the gratuitous problems it would cause?

It might seem that a simple alternative would be to give young workers the "right" to day release—that is, impose the element of compulsion on the employer, force him to offer day release, but leave the final decision to the youngsters. But this is not at all simple, either. One reason why youth unemployment is so high is that there are other hands available to fill jobs hitherto done by young workers; married women and older workers offer plenty of competition to those seeking their first job. They are likely to be thought of as more reliable and steady. And whereas young workers were once much cheaper to employ than older men and women, there has been a levelling up in recent years, and the differential has been compressed. If employers are now to be obliged to offer their day release—without some compensation—all that would happen would be that the relative attractiveness of young people for employers would fall off still more and youth unemployment would rise.

So it looks as if any scheme will involve yet more special payments to employers to add yet another subsidy to the employment of young people. This will reinforce still more the argument for the overall review of payments and programmes which is needed to stop the proliferation of Government schemes to the point where they cancel each other out.

It also points—rightly—to the day when the under-18s are thought of as the responsibility of the community as a whole, their education and broad-based training a national responsibility, not subject to the ups and downs of the trade cycle and the short-term manpower needs of individual firms. More strength to Mrs Williams's elbow, but no one should underestimate the difficulties which have yet to be overcome to translate an attractive election promise into a practical scheme.

Preparing for the hustings

As the election approaches, the major parties are busy massaging their manifestos. As Lucy Hodges shows on page 5, the outline of the Conservatives' election stance on education is becoming clearer, and Mr Norman St John-Stevas is doing his best to square the mixture of views which have been voiced in recent months.

On education, as on other topics, the Conservatives are more divided than in any recent election. There is no magic formula which can eliminate the sharp differences of emphasis between Mr St John-Stevas and Dr Rhodes Boyson, nor yet those between, say, Tameside and Leicestershire, on the best approach to secondary organization.

The Conservative answer to such examples of divergent thinking is to stand pat on the right of local authorities to determine policy. This makes difficulties for robust national politicians who want to be seen to have red, or, in this case, blue blood in their veins and who really believe they know what's what about mixed ability grouping and grammar schools. But, while the Conservatives share all the political inclinations which have produced the present interventionist mood at the Department of Education and Science, Mr St John-Stevas can see quite clearly the trouble his party would get into if they had to find a strong and coherent policy on comprehensive schools and then impose it nationally. Repeal of the 1976 Act will localize the issue and get a Tory government off the hook, or so it is hoped.

The most significant item in the manifesto, as far as the schools are concerned, is likely to be the commitment to universal testing at specified ages in the primary and secondary school. This will be couched in cautious and imprecise terms.

A continuing source of confusion (and, indeed, high comedy) is the repeated assertion that the Conservatives will "reintroduce" national standards. It has never been at all clear what is meant. Neither the Conservative Research Department nor Dr Boyson are prepared to vouchsafe an opinion. Mr St John-Stevas himself dismisses the question as beneath his notice. There were, of course, national standards under the Revised Code of 1862. It could be these which it is intended to "reintroduce" though this would seem to be carrying reaction a bit far.

It is more likely that there is some confusion with the Reading Surveys which the NFER carried out at intervals between 1948 and 1971. How to revive such surveys could be called reintroducing national standards is not clear. But in any case, the APU programme, with began this spring with maths, is intended to carry out this task better and more comprehensively than anything undertaken before, so the Conservative promise seems redundant. Perhaps it represents nothing more than the gut feeling in the Conservative Party that any innovation worth its salt is bound to be a reversion to some earlier manifestation of the Golden Age.

If this is just a charming foible, universal testing at specified ages, nationally supervised, would be much more serious. The APU has already discovered that even the preparation of light sampling tests involves the sort of curriculum analysis which edges in the direction of national syllabuses; universal testing—using APU-developed tests—would quickly carry this a long way further and then perhaps the analogy of the 1860s might not be so wide of the mark. England and Wales would then be caught in the grip of testing fever like so many American states—without even the cheerful prospect of reduced rates.

In a special category

The case of Miss Margaret Jones, the unmarried headmistress of Hedley Walter School, at Brentford, in Essex, who is about to have a baby, combines many of the elements which go to make a popular news story. The public mores are put to the test. A figure of authority is challenging the limit of the permissive society. The school governors have invited parents to say what they think about it. According to reports, Miss Jones has herself posed the issue in the following blunt terms: "After all the publicity this has received, one of the crucial factors is going to be whether people feel that head teachers are still in a special category, where they are not allowed to behave in a certain way."

Put just like that, of course, it is obvious that head teachers are in a special category.

It is a simple matter of history that not many years ago had a similar incident occurred, resignation would have been promptly demanded and given and the incident would have been hushed up as discreetly as possible. Now things are different in important respects. Employment protection legislation means that a head can only be "fairly" dismissed on grounds which a tribunal will accept.

In the last report, however, this is not a legal but a social matter, and concerns the attitude of parents towards teachers and the model of behaviour which they expect them to hold out to pupils. If education is more than instruction in school subjects this must continue to be so. Exactly how far popular expectation has changed is what, presumably, the governors of Hedley Walter school are trying to gauge, and what the Essex Education Committee may have in due course to consider. Obviously they will be influenced not only by the good reputation of the school hitherto, but also by the extent to which they believe the present events will have affected the headmistress's moral authority in the future.

Limits on class size

A few years ago, teachers' unions in Scotland fought a bitter campaign against oversize classes and won a new teachers' contract which expressly limited the teachers' teaching load to a class of not more than 33 pupils. The result was the rearrangement of classes to eliminate the largest and the smallest and things settled down to the new arrangement, lubricated by the Houghton settlement. A defeat for the executive at the Educational Institute for Scotland's conference in Edinburgh last Friday (page 4) showed that tempers are again rising on this issue.

The reason is familiar enough on both sides of the border. As schools' rolls fall, so there has to be a constant reallocation of staff and pupils in order to maintain the contract maximum class size and to prevent total staffing from rising above the levels for which finance is provided and on which cash limits are based. This has caused the growth of "composite" classes—that is, classes which combine children of more than one age group.

Composite classes have long been familiar in small country schools, but not in the city schools of the Scottish conurbations. Now the teachers have resolved that, contract or no, they will not teach composite classes of more than 25 pupils. The EIS executive is much put out. It will now have to decide what to do—or not to do—if some members want to impose sanctions against schools which persist with composite classes of a larger size. There is clearly something to be said for the flexibility which has been retained in England and Wales and for the NUT's new selective sanctions policy.

The International Baccalaureate provides a working model of a curriculum that is similar, yet significantly different, to the N and F concept of a broadened sixth-form curriculum. A.D.C. Peterson finds the comparison illuminating

N and F international

One way in which the International Baccalaureate curriculum differs from N and F is that more than 500 students, many of them British, have entered British universities with IB rather than A levels since 1973. We are therefore talking about an actuality, on however small a scale, rather than a blueprint.

Now that, as a result of the Lancaster House conference chaired by Mrs Williams last February and attended by official delegates from 32 countries, the future of the IB is reasonably assured, it might repay the investment of a little research money to investigate the performance of this group in higher education within this country.

Did they do less well in their three-year honours degree courses? Did the "non-scientists" gain anything from having continued some science and mathematics in the sixth form? Did those who were not taking modern language degree courses keep up and use their modern language? How far were they an atypical group?

Many of the reactions to N and F which the TES has already published are, of course, predictable. No one familiar with Cornford's Microcosmographica could be surprised that the Cambridge Examinations Syndicate should plead the "principle of unripe time", nor was it unexpected that the modern linguists led by Professor Hawkins should embrace N and F even if the manna it offers so easily, for them, turns to worms.

In this atmosphere of speculation, and in the hope that there is still time for modification as opposed to outright rejection or outright acceptance of N and F, it seems worth contributing the lessons of 10 years' actual experience.

IB and N and F have great similarities, but there are three main differences. First, IB requires six examined subjects, three at higher, three at subsidiary level and a very small but structured unexamined element occupying about 15 per cent of the teaching time; N and F requires five examined subjects, allocated, from the first, 30 per cent of the teaching time going to unexamined general studies.

Considering the mass of evidence which has accumulated in the 20 years since Crowther—that in practice not more than one-tenth of sixth-form pupils spent this amount of time on general studies in a three A level curriculum—it seems irrational to base the N and F syllabuses on the assumption that an expanded five subject examined curriculum could still only occupy 70 per cent of the teaching time.

If English and a foreign language are being studied at N level by science specialists who are taking F level sciences, why leave the same amount of (fictional) time for unexamined general studies, which often consist at present of English or a foreign language?

It may be that this original assumption about the amount of time available for each N and F subject has something to do with the criticisms now being made by some university faculties of the inadequacy of the draft syllabuses as preparation for three year honours degree courses. The IB pattern of three higher level subjects, each claiming six teaching periods in a 35 period week, seems to allow combinations much closer to the familiar A-level pattern than two Fs and three Ns, for example Higher Level Maths, Physics and Chemistry with subsidiary English, German and Social Anthropology.

The general studies element is provided first by two compulsory features of the IB pattern, the common course in the Theory of Knowledge (which has attracted sympathetic notice in the comments on IB in Working Paper 60) and the half-day involvement in experiential learning through aesthetic or social service activity. General studies is provided secondly by the fact that only one of the subsidiary level subjects may be on a syllabus designed within the school, submitted to the board and then internally assessed.

With 500 students now at university with IB qualifications, the time is ripe for research into their comparative performance

This has allowed enthusiasts in different schools to teach marine science, Islamic studies, politics, drama, photographic science and 30 other subjects within the structure of the examinations for the IB diploma. Even the internally assessed, but in future externally moderated, Theory of Knowledge course can contribute a bonus point to the candidate's final score; an annexe attached to the diploma records his "half-day" activities. No part of the candidate's achievement is considered irrelevant to the final record or profile in the diploma.

It might be feared that accepting internal assessment of one of the six subjects was too risky to reliability. It has not proved so. All IB subjects are graded on a seven-point scale and a comparison of average grades in internally assessed and externally assessed subsidiary subjects showed the internally assessed grades higher but only by less than half a point. This seems to me to represent fairly the improved achievement likely to come from students working under an enthusiast on a syllabus of their own choice. In any case one internally assessed subsidiary subject in a battery of six does not worry university selectors.

The second great difference is that while the proposers of N and F expressed the pious hope that it would lead to a broader education and Working Paper 60 produced some evidence that its adoption might provoke a modest move in that direction, the IB requires every candidate for the diploma to offer two languages (one usually the mother tongue) mathematics, science and "study of man" at one or other level.

All the 500-plus who have entered our universities carried mathematics and a foreign language in the sixth form and thus received an education comparable with that of their European neighbours but which it is often maintained would be beyond the capacity of, or cruel and unnatural punishment for, English boys and girls.

What I think we have demonstrated is that it can be done. Whether it should be done depends on one's views of the "core curriculum" or the "cafeteria system" in schools, an issue too large to discuss in a single article but one on which American experience may have something to teach us.

The third difference is that the IB, while offering individual certificates in all except internally assessed subjects, reverts for its diploma candidates to the group certificate. To earn the diploma which is recognized as a matriculation qualification in most countries, a candidate must offer the full course and score a minimum of 24 points (six times four, the mid-point of the seven point scale).

There are compensation arrangements by which a low mark in one subject can be compensated by a high mark in another and this greatly relieves the minds of poor linguists and poor mathematicians. In addition there are bonus points for the theory of knowledge and for the "extended essay", the 4,000 to 6,000 word individual paper which every candidate writes on a theme of his own choice.

While the general total for the diploma determines matriculation the individual grades in the different subjects are also recorded and can be used by faculty admissions officers, which makes the IB much easier to deal with for our universities than the European baccalaureate.

Of course we could not adopt the IB pattern nationally even if we wanted to. There would not be enough teachers of mathematics and foreign languages. But perhaps some of our experience may be of interest to the planners of N and F or of its successor; perhaps, as suggested in 1973, a small scale limited, nationally controlled experiment with the IB pattern or a modification of it might be worth mounting; and perhaps we might aim in the long run to extend education in English, mathematics and a foreign language beyond O level to all our potential entrants to higher education.

Letter to the Editor

Gifted also need remedial skills

Sir,—In the report of David Hopkinson's book, The Education of Gifted Children ("Streaming urged to save talents of the highly gifted", June 2), your correspondent pointed out that nearly every secondary school has a teacher responsible for remedial education and that only a minority, if any, have a similar post for the "opposite end of the ability range".

Disregarding the assumption that all "remedial" children are lacking in ability, an observation which we know not to be accurate, I wonder if much thought has been given to the development of the remedial teacher's role with regard to the gifted child.

Surely we can recognize the significance of the contribution which a teacher skilled in meeting the needs of learning-handicapped pupils can make towards ameliorating the difficulties often experienced by boys and girls of outstanding potential.

The professional remedial educator has a knowledge of identification and assessment techniques; a thorough grounding in the study of child development; a practical skill in the preparation of structured materials and a conscious awareness of the promotion of study skills.

He has, too, a particular working knowledge of the emotional needs of children—an area in which the academically gifted youngster is often seriously handicapped, particularly when one considers the phenomenon of middle class deprivation. Might schools then, rather than looking to establish new appointments in an attempt to deal with the problems presented by the gifted pupil, turn instead to the expertise contained within their remedial departments?

Certainly, an involvement for the remedial teacher with the gifted stars of the school community would not only positively assist the gifted student but would additionally make for an increased status on the remedial teacher and, more importantly, on the remedial child.

Callaghan preparing another speech?

The Prime Minister is thinking about making another speech on education. In the autumn of 1976 Mr Callaghan launched the Great Debate with his Ruskin speech, and he now feels that it is time to reflect on the discussion and bring things up to date.

He has asked the Department of Education and Science to brief him on the whole field. What aspect he chooses to emphasize, if he does make a speech, will depend on his political instincts in the run-up to the General Election.

Mr Callaghan is not expected to talk about standards, since he has already done that. Preparing for society, education and industry links and the whole 16-19 question have also had a fair airing.

It is thought that he may choose to develop the family theme which he got off to such a promising start in his speech at the recent Labour women's rally at Southport. In it he showed, for the first time publicly, an awareness that there are serious gaps in the provision for under-fives.

If he chooses this theme, he is likely to find useful material in his DES brief, since there are signs that policy initiatives on nursery education are now being prepared in the Department. It would be valuable to have a lead from the top on under-fives policy which cuts across DES and Department of Health and Social Security boundaries, since it is becoming increasingly clear that what is needed is cooperation between the departments on joint day-care and nursery school provision.

No date or place has yet been fixed. However, it is understood that, since the Ruskin speech was given to an academic audience, Mr Callaghan will seek a rather different venue next time.

APU unveils language test plans

by Bob Doe

Details were published this week of the national language testing which the Government's Assessment of Performance Unit propose to introduce next year. They were revealed in a discussion document called Language Performance. The APU started their maths tests last month.

The document outlines the sort of reading and writing to be assessed and the unit says it will also look into the possibility of testing speaking and listening skills.

Eight types of reading will be tested, though the document gives no hint as to how this will be done. These include: reading to get the general gist of a passage or chapter; skimming quickly through a passage to locate specific details; reading to expand on information already given, following a sequence of instructions; finding the answers to questions on a text; detecting information that is only implied; or drawing conclusions about the writer's intentions or bias.

The unit will also be looking for evidence of children's reading for pleasure and to see if it can make use of tables of contents and indexes.

Eleven-year-olds will be asked to respond to pictures, music or writing, for an autobiographical narrative, a fictional story, and for various accounts of things they have seen, learned about, or plan to do.

Fifteen-year-olds will be set similar tasks but more objectivity and analysis will be required. They will also be asked to argue particular points of view and to review both sides of an argument.

The unit will sample these tasks by looking both at writing produced under test conditions, and that produced in the classroom.

It will assess it in two ways: spelling and punctuation will be marked and an "overall impression" rating will be given.

Language Performance issued free by the Department of Education and Science, Room 1/27, DES, Elizabeth House, York Road, London SE1 7PH.

Parents and the public are being asked for their views about the pregnancy of the unmarried head, Miss Margaret Jones, pictured above with the baby's father, Mr David Rees. The governors of the school, Hedley Walter comprehensive, in Brentwood, Essex, have appealed for opinions through the columns of the local paper. The education authority had originally thought Miss Jones was married until it received an anonymous tip-off. The baby's father, deputy head of Little Highwood Hospital school for the mentally handicapped, is himself married with children but plans to marry Miss Jones after he has gained a divorce.

Appeal on computer training

Middle-class morality in our education system is preventing Britain from preparing for an automated future, said Professor Sir Sam Edwards, former chairman of the Science Research Council, last week.

He told a British Association symposium on "Automation—friend or foe?" that the imbalance in teaching at British schools and universities gave the aspiring skilled craftsman a poor deal. His school subjects were remote from his professional needs.

This had important repercussions for industry, which is faced with an inevitable increase in automation. For Britain to perform well in future, we needed more skilled people to handle automated machines and more highly educated people to make them.

But our schools were not producing nearly enough skilled craftsmen.

Computer programming was still not taught in schools despite its relative simplicity and importance for future generations. THES.

Trousered women win war of Maiden Erlegh

The Berkshire head who refused to allow women teachers to wear trousers in class finally climbed down this week when the number of rebels climbed from nine to 13 and the National Union of Teachers threatened to withdraw all its 55 members at the school.

The dispute—at Maiden Erlegh, a mixed 1,400 pupil comprehensive in Reading—has been going on for two years and the women teachers claim they used all the conventional channels open to them.

The union was brought in, the ban was discussed at staff and governors' meetings and even wound its way through the local authority's grievance procedure. But it stayed.

Then, last week, nine women teachers—out of a total teaching force of 84—decided to turn up in trousers. According to Mr Ray Fox, the union's regional official, they were prevented from going about their normal duties by the head, Mr James Dunckley, and remained in school but in a separate room.

This was when the story hit the headlines. Meetings were arranged involving the union, the education authority, the head and the governors, but the women kept on coming to school in trousers. The number of rebels climbed to 13, and the union threatened that its 55 members at the school would walk out if the ban was enforced.

Mr Dunkley stayed away from the school for three days, but returned for a governors' meeting. On Wednesday he issued a statement: "At a meeting of the governors of Maiden Erlegh last evening they considered the continuing and worsening situation at the school whereby certain members of staff are actively and openly defying the head's authority.

"The governors received the head's assessment of the situation and, in particular, noted the overwhelming support he had received from a vast number of parents. However, they decided they had no alternative but to accept the head's proposal that he would forthwith remove the embargo on the wearing of trousers by women staff."

Mr Dunkley said he had banned trousers because he thought it "appropriate in order to help parents to realise their hopes and aspirations for their children". He had changed his mind because "my job is one of responsibility and not principle, and bearing this in mind, I have to do what is right for the school". His relations with staff were excellent, he said.

Mr Fox disputes this. "This is just the tip of the iceberg", he said. "Communication with staff has completely broken down."

The teachers were not militant types. They did not want to challenge their head's authority or look scruffy, or wear trousers to school every day.

"In this day and age trousers are an acceptable form of dress. You can have very smart trousers, just as you can have very scruffy skirts or sweaters."

"We are not here to discuss which lady teachers should wear trousers and which shouldn't".

Rise in payroll tax adds £50m to bill for l.e.a.s

The 12½ per cent increase in National Insurance contributions announced by the Chancellor, Mr Denis Healey, last week will cost local education authorities £50m this year and £100m next year.

The rise in contributions paid by employers was Mr Healey's response to the Conservative's amendments to his budget in April, which cut the standard rate of income tax by 1p to 33p in the £1. The cut would cost about £500m. The increase in National Insurance contributions from October 2 will yield £500m in the current financial year and about £1,500m in a full year.

Education authorities will have to pay their share of the increase, but there were moves this week to obtain reimbursement from the Government. An increase in this year's rate support grant is due in the autumn and local authorities will be pressing the Department of the Environment to include the National Insurance rise in the rate support grant supplement.

A spokesman for the Association of Metropolitan Authorities said authorities could "reasonably expect" all of the money to be paid back to them.

Voucher trial wins vote

by Stephen Cohen

Kent education committee decided this week to go ahead with an experiment with education vouchers in one or more areas. Approval for the pilot project rests with the county council next month.

The committee voted in favour of a trial although teachers and the eight Labour members opposed it. It hopes to finance the experiment with money from outside bodies. If not, the county's education budget will not have to bear any cost.

A feasibility study on vouchers, commissioned by Kent, was published last week. It reported that the cost of the system could vary from £100,000 to £600,000 a year.

It also disclosed that most teachers were against the scheme. Nearly half said they would not work in a school where pupils were admitted by vouchers and a third of these said they would look for another job, retire or quit teaching.

Mr Dewi Bonner, president of the National Union of Teachers, said this week that the union would not relax its opposition to vouchers. He told the union's Swadlincote, Derbyshire association that vouchers would involve a shuttle service of temporary buildings and teachers from school to school, which would bring chaos.

"This is allegedly being done in the name of parental choice, yet it would involve short-term decisions from a shifting population of parents and would be against educational good sense", said Mr Bonner. "Election year can bring all sorts of promises and assurances but don't let's be taken in by something as educationally disastrous as a voucher scheme."

CICERO AND THE END OF THE ROMAN REPUBLIC

W. K. Lacey

Marcus Tullius Cicero was a man of peace in an age of political turmoil and violence. Throughout his life Rome was torn by a succession of military commanders and others of noble birth aiming at power for themselves through force of arms. Cicero too was ambitious, but his ambition was for fame and reputation, and his sole weapon was his oratory. This book shows how Cicero rose from obscurity to achieve the highest honours in the Roman State, and how despite his influence, he was powerless to prevent its destruction.

Educational Institute of Scotland Conference, Edinburgh

Scots union moves against oversize composite classes

The Educational Institute of Scotland, the country's biggest teaching union, is to advise its members to refuse to teach composite classes with more than 25 pupils from the start of next term. A motion on this was passed by the institute against the recommendation of its executive at the EIS annual conference in Edinburgh.

Moving the motion, Mr John McAnally, of Walkerburn Primary School, Peeblesbire, said: "A reduction in composite class sizes would help employment for those student teachers who were going to qualify this year without the prospect of a teaching job.

"We may argue that there are priorities in salaries but I would argue that employing these young teachers was the greatest priority of all."

Composite classes were unfair to the teachers and certainly unfair to the pupils, he said.

Mr Keir Bloomer chairman of the teachers' side of the Scottish Teachers' Service Conditions Committee, said there was no doubt that composite classes had become one of the most crucial issues in education.

The solution lay in getting the Scottish Education Department to assume responsibility, implicit in its partnership in the teachers' contract, to raise the level of the rate support grant so as to improve the levels of primary school staffing. What the EIS had done, and was doing, was to keep pressure on the SED to so assume this responsibility.

Mr Bloomer asked members to have nothing to do with this motion on composite classes. It was an invitation to undertake a work to rule in defiance of contractual agreements and would leave teachers open to disciplinary proceedings. It also asked teachers to depart from an agreement which had been entered into with the management.

Miss Alana Ross, Glasgow association, said in support of the motion that they could not expect to get more teachers by merely asking for an increas in the rate support grant. Teachers would have to fight.

The motion was carried by 225 votes to 132.

In another debate, Edinburgh and Fife local associations persuaded the conference that the institute should adopt a policy of refusing to cover for any absent colleague or vacant post in schools. They demanded that education authorities should make every effort to provide supply teachers to cover all vacancies and absences.

Sixth form grants get smooth ride

Local authorities are fast reaching agreement with the Government over grants for pupils who stay at school after 16.

Mrs Williams, the Education Secretary, and leader of the Council of Local Education Authorities, decided last month that the scheme should go ahead. The next meeting, in two weeks' time will discuss the practical arrangements for paying out the means-tested allowances to pupils.

Local authorities are keen to have the system administered by the Department of Health and Social Security which, they argue, already has to deal with unemployed teenagers claiming supplementary benefits.

But the DHSS does not want to take on any extra work, and has insisted that education authorities should handle it. One estimate of the cost of running the scheme is about £5m a year. No value has yet been put on the allowances, but current thinking is hovering around £7 to £7.50.

Sheffield has already decided to introduce grants worth up to £7 a week, without waiting for the national scheme.

Agreement has not yet been reached on who should get the allowances. Mrs Williams has not committed herself to making the grants freely available to all sixth-formers, but the Association of County Councils wants there to be no discrimination concerning the courses pupils follow.

The authorities are keen, however, to have the right to decide on "borderline" cases. They argue that, through their schools and teachers, they are closest to pupils and are aware of any special circumstances which might effect young people deciding whether to stay on at school or leave at 16.

Cane, used sparingly, is useful says union chief

by Stephen Cohen

A spirited defence of the right of teachers to use corporal punishment was mounted yesterday by Mr Stan Jones, president of the National Association of Schoolmasters-Union of Women Teachers.

Writing in the union's magazine, he said caning was an emotive issue. The European Court's recent decision on birching in the Isle of Man had led to "a spate of emotional outbursts" on the subject. It was now impossible, he said, for rational and sensible consideration to be given to it while "this almost hysterical outcry goes on".

Many schools had no need to recourse to caning, said Mr Jones. "However, where there is a need it is used sparingly, moderately and normally is only resorted to when all other means have failed."

The community had a right to expect reasonable norms of behaviour coupled with a high degree of learning and achievement schools.

Abolitionists talked of corp punishment being degrading psychologically damaging, he s "No mention is ever made of psychological effects upon the sical dignity of teachers, many whom have been physically assau and subjected all too often to sive, arrogant and insulting viour."

● Where, the education maga for parents, this week publish table which reveals that no authority has totally abolished poral punishment. Some ban it infants, girls, handicapped or cate children—and many discour it. But only 10 authorities the number of strokes of the which may be used.

The magazine also reprodu model letter for parents to se their authority if they do not their children beaten.

Redbridge keeps options open

Redbridge, one of the Conservative-controlled education authorities which has been holding out against going fully comprehensive, caved in last week—but only through a form of words, it now appears.

It said that after 1986 it would stop admitting pupils through 11-plus at the two remaining grammar schools—Ilford County High School for Boys and Woodford County High School for Girls. This does not mean the schools will necessarily close down. More likely, it means that the authority wants to keep all its options open but at the same time, be seen to comply with the law. Above all, what it wants is a Conservative Government before it has to do anything.

The council made it quite clear in its surrender letter to Mrs liams, Education Secretary, th wanted to keep the two schools "academic centres". It was s mitting proposals solely to meet William's requirements under default order, it said.

"It will be appreciated that time limit imposed has not all the authority to carry out ext consultations or to undertake pupil feasibility studies which normally be regarded as a sine non.

"These studies would natur and necessarily, have included future role of the two schools cerned in relation to the author educational provision as a wh and the complex educational organizational problems indica with falling secondary school

Too many parents . . .

Apart from the Munn report on a common core curriculum and Dunning report on assessment, on which the conference largely endorsed the Institute's previous observations to the Secretary of State, the main educational issues discussed were the role of parents in schools and racialist attitudes in school books.

Mrs Kirsty Dodds, of the Angus local association, proposed an unsuccessful motion that parents should not participate in the day-to-day activities carried on in schools. Parents, she said, had a right to know what and how their children were being taught. But in some schools parents were undertaking teaching and related duties: auxiliary tasks especially in infant departments, the supervision of knitting/sewing and arts and crafts, and story reading.

"If this is being done because teachers are harassed due to teacher shortages then we should be pressing for extra staff," said Mrs Dodds. "It makes a nonsense of our training if we start expecting parents to do our job."

Mr Sandy Doherty, Stewartry, said any problems should be resolved as local level. The motion, he felt, would close the door on many parent-teacher relationships.

After acceptance of a motion from the Glasgow association, as amended by Shetland, the EIS council are to investigate the "racialist and sexist attitudes inherent in many books used in schools."

Despite opposition from Mr Norman Macleod, the conference overwhelmingly passed a resolution which seeks to have Gaelic included in Munn's compulsory core in bilingual communities.

Damper on conditions action

Debates on conditions of service proved scrappy affairs with many of the members suspicious that the leadership's repeated opposition to adding to the number of conditions on which delegates wanted action was a cloak for opposition to some of the resolutions.

A number of unsuccessful resolutions wanted new remits taken up by the institute's representatives on the Scottish teachers' service conditions committee. These ranged from industrial action on nursery schools to improved maternity leave for pregnant teachers.

But Mr Keir Bloomer, convener of the teachers' side on the STSCC, saw the bulk of the resolutions as additional "burdens" on the negotiators.

This argument was also used to defeat resolutions which sought to tie the institute to specific targets for class sizes and to take appropriate action if necessary.

The only such motions to be carried against the executive related to composite classes in primary schools and to the provision of supply teachers.

Delegates refused to accept a motion from the institute's nursery teachers' section that industrial action should begin later this year if their existing policy of a nursery pupil teacher ratio of 1:2 was not not achieved by the beginning of next session.

Belt inaction continues

The institute reaffirmed its policy of phasing out corporal punishment in schools only when suitable alternatives were available. The conference resisted attempts by the Glasgow and Ross and Cromarty local associations to set August 1979 as the date when phasing out should begin.

Mrs Marjorie Bell, moving the unsuccessful motion for the Glasgow association, warned that refusal to set a date would merely reinforce the status quo. "It is time for the discussion to end and action to begin", she said.

Impractical knowledge

I have heard it claimed, with what truth I do not know, that parts of the Third World are littered with unused modern mechanical, electrical and electronic equipment. It may be medical, or agricultural, or industrial, or military. It is not used either because no one is quite sure how to use it properly, or because it has developed some defect, and there is no one with the expertise to repair it.

Technology without education and training is valueless. One of the most helpful forms of overseas aid to developing countries is the development there of knowledge and skills. This is often superior to paying for massive building projects which may have little impact upon the lives of the mass of the population, and always superior to the export of sophisticated weaponry which is a waste of scarce resources if it is not or cannot be used, and is a disaster if it is.

Of course, we help developing countries materially through the admission of students from them to British further and higher education—even if it does not count towards the official tally of overseas aid, and DES or Treasury from time to time grumble about the cost, and ILEA gets its collective knickers into a twist and goes to war with its own colleges in order to reduce the burden which it believes overseas students place upon them.

Not all of this is necessarily what the developing countries most need. Even when highly qualified personnel return permanently to work in their own countries—and not all do—the skilled engineer or scientist, and even the doctor, may find his or her effectiveness greatly impaired if there is inadequate support from those with technician and craft skills.

It is arguable that the courses offered in non-advanced further education may sometimes be more apposite to the needs of some countries than the acceptance of students from them in British universities. Many such countries, having attained independence, created universities of their own, or continued the development of universities founded under the colonial regime. Some have learnt that this is not always the best use of limited funds, and have switched their priority to secondary, craft and technical education and training.

Our Overseas Development Ministry and its associated agencies, like TETOC, do seek to export British education and training to Third World countries, by putting bodies on the ground to develop the type and level of skills which the inhabitants most surely need. The British Council—despite the low esteem in which its efforts seem to be held by the denizens of the Government's Think-Tank, who perhaps cannot see outwards through the glass which surrounds them as they swim—weighs in with both a physical presence and the written word, even if the latter is of little value to those who cannot read.

It is good to see that the Parents' National Educational Union, a voluntary body founded by Charlotte Mason, no less, plans to increase its own contribution to this effort. The union, the name of which belies its function, has traditionally arranged for the education in Britain of the children of natives of these islands serving overseas. Now it is seeking to develop in some countries schools which will provide for those children on the spot, and also for some local children.

Perhaps even more significant in the long run is work undertaken in The Gambia by Dr Elsa Woodward, of the division of clinical chemistry of the Clinical Research Centre at Northwick Park, Middlesex, a Medical Research Council centre. Some simple instruments for use in medical laboratories were developed there. One of their advantages was that nothing much could go wrong with them, another that they were cheap. They should be of great value in the Third World provided enough technicians can be trained to use them effectively.

Dr. Woodward developed a pack of simple teaching materials the use of the instruments. took them to The Gambia for ing although they are what in University jargon would be "distance learning materials". take the trainee through the lishment and conduct of ments, using the instruments by simple step; there is no tion of prior knowledge. Standards, discipline, vouchers—the rhetoric suggests change, but the reality is that change will not come easily to an elected Tory Party. Lucy Hodges finds a growing diffidence in the camp

Blue turns to grey

● Rhodes Boyson: quieter of late

● St. John-Stevas: 'Not an election issue'

If the Conservatives won the next general election, how would they change education policy? The short answer is probably that any changes would be fairly minor and come slowly.

The Tory education authorities which are either dragging their feet, or holding out, over full comprehensive reorganization would joyfully throw their half-baked plans to the winds with the repeal of the 1976 Education Act; and that would be that, certainly in the short term.

The tone of ministerial pronouncements would change. There would be more talk of standards, discipline and parental choice. The vocabulary would be different. But anyone who thinks the Conservatives are going to do anything wild—turn back the clock and reorganize comprehensives or embrace the voucher idea—has not been listening to Mr Norman St John-Stevas, the Tory spokesman on education.

In spite of the recent efforts of Dr John Rae, a Liberal Party education adviser and head of Westminster School, and the untiring campaigns of Dr Rhodes Boyson, the Conservative deputy education spokesman to stir the Tories into some kind of debate, the Party remains relatively unmoved. There are a number of reasons for this.

The Conservatives are never keen to wash dirty linen in public. Mr St John-Stevas is anyway known to frown on ex-cathedra statements from his colleagues and they are all being careful at the moment not to step out of line. There are deep splits among them, but even the populist MP from Brent, North, Dr Boyson, has been quiet of late.

Mr St John-Stevas himself maintains that education is not a subject that sets anyone alight, let alone the Conservative Party. (And he is no exception it seems.) He says education is not an election issue—or if it is, it is a subliminal issue—and that it is undesirable to have endless party political clashes about it.

When he does berate Mrs Shirley Williams, the Education Secretary, it is in the leg-pulling style of debate so characteristic of Mr St John-Stevas and the Cambridge and Oxford Unions, both of which he decorated in his youth.

But, more seriously, there is little for the Conservatives to debate. They accept with varying shades of reluctance that comprehensive schools are here to stay, that to try to dismantle them would create yet more chaos for the 80 per cent of children now in them. What they are left with are opportunities to present new ideas for comprehensives and ways of tinkering with the system for the 20 per cent of children still remaining in the unreorganized sector.

In an article in The Times last month, Mr St John-Stevas outlined what these were, in between a diatribe against Dr Rae for his critique of Tory party policy. He referred to the Parents' Charter drawn up by the party, Conservative ideas for improved in-service training for teachers, better selection of heads and the relation of the curriculum of the last years at school to the industrial world of work.

The party would also reintroduce, he wrote, "national standards of literacy and numeracy, which were unwisely done away with by the Labour Government in 1966". Questioned about this, Mr St John-Stevas said he did not know what these standards were or who monitored them. "You'll have to research that one yourself", he said. Neither the Conservative Research Department nor Dr Boyson was any the wiser.

Anyway, if Mr St John-Stevas has his way the standards to be "reintroduced" would be monitored by the Assessment of Performance Unit and additional tests administered locally at two of four ages—seven, 11, 13 or 14. The party would like to see smaller comprehensives, an end to split sites and an emphasis on streaming and setting rather than on mixed ability teaching. Comprehensives would be allowed to develop their own special expertise in maths, languages, science and the arts to help their academic achievement. But in all these matters it would be up to local education authorities to decide how they wished to go.

A new, improved version of the direct grant system for bright working class children would be the assisted places scheme. This is one of the planks criticized by Dr Rae on the grounds that it negates the comprehensive principle and shows how confused Conservative policy is. Mr St John-Stevas refutes this angrily. There is no reason, he thinks, why a comprehensive system should not exist with a selective component of up to 10 per cent.

"The logic of the argument is rather that you won't have a comprehensive system until you abolish the private sector", he says. "I approach it from the point of view of what is best for children, not what is best for a system. The major effort must be on comprehensives but it is a matter of balancing the various needs of the system."

He makes the point that his party is not sold on one particular way of doing things, and that anyway he has to draw together policy in a party that is strongly committed to selection. It is when you scratch the surface of the comprehensive versus selection argument and when you look closer at some of the Tories ideas that the splits emerge.

Mr St John-Stevas and some other Tory MPs, particularly the younger ones who are interested in education such as Messrs Keith Hampson and Nigel Foreman, hope the comprehensive v. selection debate is over. Many others, including a large number who have never been to a state school and would not send their children to one, hope it is not.

Ironically the latter group's most effective spokesman is Dr Boyson, the man in the Tory party who is steeped in the state sector, having been a comprehensive head. He does not believe comprehensive schools will work. "In certain areas they will be a major disaster" he says. "The argument is not over. It was over in Russia in 1931 and look at how they have returned to selection now. In the USA it is happening as well."

The people who are really losing but in comprehensives are the poor, Dr Boyson says. "The articulate and wealthy will always get what they want. It is the poor little bugger at the bottom who gets ground to death."

In his view, comprehensive education enfranchises the middle classes at the expense of the working classes which is where his campaign for voucher experiments comes in. "It enfranchises the most deprived in the community", he says. "The voucher is an inarticulate means of choice." It would also lead to other desirable improvements that parents—and Dr Boyson—want to see, such as the development of a core curriculum.

Dr Boyson is obviously keen not to antagonise Mr St John-Stevas too much over his voucher ideas, certainly not too publicly at any rate. Mr St John-Stevas was angry at the front page splash in The Sunday Times a few weeks ago which suggested that the Tories favoured vouchers more than they did. Everyone assumed it was inspired by Dr Boyson.

"What we have said is that we would allow local authorities to have experiments if this is what they wanted to do but nothing more than that," Mr St John-Stevas said at the time.

He is supported by other Conservatives who see the voucher idea as unworkable, but Mrs Thatcher's position on the matter is unclear. (She is known to respect Dr Boyson's instincts and his chalkface experience.) It is not likely to be part of the party's election platform which Mr. St John-Stevas says has already been worked out by the Shadow Cabinet. The main theme is preserving and raising standards and values, under which heading is subsumed learning, discipline and religious and moral education. In this context the party is keen to strengthen Her Majesty's Inspectorate.

The other plank is parental choice. The Tories propose to amend the 1944 Education Act in order to strengthen the obligation on l.e.a.s to take account of parents' wishes. They also believe exam results should be published and a professional teaching council established.

Behind the policy-making this year have been four working parties—one on teacher training chaired by Dr Boyson, another on vocational education and training chaired by Nigel Foreman, MP, a third on the educational needs of the gifted and handicapped chaired by Nicholas Winterton, MP, and a fourth on youth with Alan Hazelhurst, MP, as chairman. Their reports go to the Shadow Cabinet.

Another group on education and industry set up by Keith Hampson has also been beavering away for some time. The four policy groups contained people who were not necessarily Conservatives, which is why their names are not being released.

Dr Boyson's group, for example, included a prominent head of a public school, a comprehensive head, lecturers from colleges of education, a chairman of an education authority, a leader of a Tory group and one other MP.

One issue the Conservatives have still to clear their thoughts on is the 16-plus examination. In The Right Approach to Education published in October 1976 they say they are sceptical about such a change. "Both the bright and the less academically able child should be catered for and we do not believe it is possible to do this by means of the single examination which has been proposed."

Although the Conservatives still have to work out their thinking on some issues and are still split on some fundamentals, links between local and national Tory leaders have been strengthened in many cases by the battle to stop Mrs Williams imposing comprehensive schools on recalcitrant authorities. Mr St John-Stevas last year set up a panel of QCs, solicitors and educationists to give advice to local authorities.

The complexion of a Tory government's education policy will depend very much on who is in control. At the moment Mr St John-Stevas is riding high. He did well at the Conservative Party conference last autumn, eliciting a standing ovation for his "Hold on, help is coming" message to local authorities. Rumour had it that this helped him hang on to his job, and was also why he stayed an extra day at the conference.

It was a clever speech and must have impressed the Blessed Margaret, as Mr St John-Stevas calls her. But it remains to be seen for how long his star will be in the ascendant.

Children work better slightly chilled

Boys and girls aged seven to nine at primary school do not shed clothes as it gets hotter during the day; according to a Building Research Establishment survey of 641 children.

Perhaps, says Mr M. A. Humphreys, who undertook the research, it's because they do not think of it. Or maybe its because the kind of clothes they are wearing do not allow them to change.

"There would have been much less discomfort if the children had made the requisite adjustments, or if the rooms had been designed to give a steadier temperature during the day."

His report, A study of the thermal comfort of primary school children in summer, is accompanied by numerous graphs and charts which give the variations in warmth, clothing and temperature for June 1971, and July, 1972. Of the 641 children, only 262 produced records the author could use. And these tended to be the older children.

With the aid of a questionnaire and pictures the children were asked how they were feeling on a scale "much too hot" to "much too cold". Then they were asked to tick off what they were wearing. Garments Mr Humphreys had not prepared for were football shorts, poncho, hot-pants and a swimming costume.

The children were from five local primary schools and of mixed ability. Each study was planned to last a fortnight with the children filling in their forms four times a day.

Mr Humphreys found that children wore clothes that were the right weight according to the temperature over several days but that were not necessarily suitable for the climate on a particular day. He also observed that some children noticed changes in temperature much more than others, but that girls were not more hot-blooded or cold-blooded than boys.

Fewest children were uncomfortable when the temperature was about two degrees below the average for the classroom. The teachers told Mr Humphreys that the best sort of temperature for teaching was between 19 and 21 degrees. In this climate children are not so cold that they have to run around to keep warm, and not so hot that they sit around doing nothing.

N and F 'bandwagon' attack

by Bob Doe

Doubts about the proposed new sixth-form exams were voiced in Oxford last week by school teachers and dons. The N and F level replacements for A level would be more expensive, depress standards and impose an intolerable burden on schools, it was claimed.

Teachers from Oxford colleges met teachers from Oxfordshire secondary schools at a conference organized by the university to discuss proposals to broaden the sixth-form curriculum.

In place of three A levels the Schools Council says sixth formers should do five subjects; three at N level (each equivalent to half an A level) and two at F level (each equivalent to three quarters of an A level).

But Mr Keith Dawson, head of John Mason School, Abingdon, was against such a change and argued instead for improvements to A levels.

"A levels are suitable for well over half the present sixth-form population. There is strong evidence that pupils, schools and higher education are well satisfied with the qualification they know.

"Don't leap on the bandwagon until you know where it is going", he warned.

A levels alone did not provide a sufficiently wide education, however, and he thought N levels might be introduced gradually as subsidiary level sixth form qualifications. "One of the great failures of sixth forms is their failure to take general studies seriously."

Mr Dawson doubted the Schools Council's reassurances that the new system would not require any more resources than the old. "Few schools would accept that the weaker N level student should be taught less in the second year than in the first."

There would be a serious shortage of maths and language teachers and a tendency to increase the burden of the sixth form on the lower school. The emphasis on project and course work assessment would take up to much time and leave teachers exhausted.

N and F would mean more exams than with A levels. "The impact of public exams on schools already wrecks any effective teaching after Easter."

Students would continue to specialize in the sixth form unless they were forced to take a broader course. He regretted the council' decision not to build any such compulsion into their proposals.

Mr Peter Dines, one of the council's joint secretaries, said this criticism was a "professional slur" on the teaching profession. "It is part of a school's job to see that they are giving youngsters the education that society, university and employers want."

However, as a result of the widespread discussion of N and F some sort of prescription might be built into the proposals.

"Our sixth form courses narrowest in the Western If broadening is importan three A levels have got to

Ban urged on lethal play equipment

by Carolyn O'Grady

Death and injury in children's playgrounds amid administrative confusion and negligence is described in a report published this week by Fair Play for Children, at national voluntary group which campaigns for more and better play areas.

The information and recommendations were produced by a committee representing 13 organizations concerned with play and safety. These include the British Safety Council, the Consumer Association, the Design Centre, the Greater London Parks Department, and the National Playing Fields Association.

The lowest estimate of the number of serious injuries and deaths from playground accidents, says the report, is 150,000 a year. The highest is 250,000.

It calls for the removal of three items from every playground — the plank swing or pendulum see-saw, the ocean wave or witches hat, and the rocking horse or rocking boat.

The rocking horse and pendulum see-saw, were recently recommended by the Department of Environment for use in playgrounds. "Discussions are now taking place between the committee and department for the immediate withdrawal of these items."

But the biggest single killer in the playground, says the committee, is the concrete surface underneath the equipment. It calls for the elimination of concrete and research to identify the safest and most suitable surfacing material.

Defective and badly maintained equipment is a major cause of accidents, says the committee. Thorough daily checks of playgrounds should be made along with "exhaustive annual inspections".

"Where regular playground checks are organized . . . the inspectors on the ground frequently do an extremely cursory job and have very little understanding of what they should be doing and why. Classically a man stands in the middle of the playground with a check-list on a clipper board, gazes around casually, marks a series of ticks and moves on".

However, the report recognizes that negligence is often due to the the up-keep of playgrounds. It calls for a major restructuring of the administrative apparatus which deals with them.

"The playgrounds of Britain are caught up in a vast bureaucratic mesh where nobody determines policy or standards, still less enforces them with regulations or procedures".

The report calls for the unification of all playground administration area to achieve a common programme of supervision, inspections and maintenance. It recommends the adoption of safety procedures, which it outlines, and the appointment of play officers in each local authority with "authority over playground inspectors and supervisors from all departments".

Central government departments, it says, should start immediate inquiries into the numbers of unsafe and badly maintained playgrounds in Britain and should publish recommendations for raising safety standards.

The Department of Health and Social Security should formulate procedures to ensure that playgrounds are supervised by personnel with first-aid training and that information and first-aid materials are readily to hand to assist prompt medical attention.

Fair Play for Children has also published a checklist for parents which can be used to survey local playgrounds and to press for changes at local level, and they have organized a private exhibition in the House of Lords illustrating dangerous and poorly maintained equipment.

Training for the 14-19 age group is increasingly a priority. Mark Jackson reports from an NUT-organized conference : Young People in Transition

In transition, but to where . . .

Deep divisions among educators and others concerned with young people emerged from the two-day special conference on the education and training of the 14- to 19-year-olds run by the National Union of Teachers in London last week.

The differences revolved both around fundamental issues, such as the whole future role of education and its socio-economic context, and more immediately practical matters, such as the ability of the schools and colleges to cope with the present needs of teenagers.

The conference, sponsored jointly with a number of other organizations including the EEC and the Manpower Services Commission, brought together industrialists and unionists, economic experts, politicians, and college lecturers, who much of the time drowned out the voice of the teachers.

The one objective on which all the 250 participants — including a powerful contingent from the Continent — were wholeheartedly in agreement was the need to develop a coordinated and comprehensive system of education and training which should embrace pupils from the age of 14, and for coordination to begin now at local level without waiting for developments nationally.

The clashes arose over :

The curriculum—the extent to which it needs to be changed, and how much it should be made to serve direct vocational needs.

Unemployment — whether the young need to be prepared for it.

Role of the schools and colleges —whether they are the right places for most of the under motivated young to learn what they need to.

Relevance of formal qualifications—and the relative importance of literacy and numeracy as compared with broader life skills.

Resources—whether education should welcome the channelling of additional resources through the Manpower Services Commission or insist on all funds being allocated through the education service, if necessary by specific grants.

Quantity and quality of education —whether the schools and colleges can provide for the whole age group without massive additional manpower and money.

Cutting across the debate, a group of teachers—mainly from the colleges—pleaded with the conference to leave the long term issues and deal with the immediate practicalities. "How are we going to cope with the youngsters who will be dumped on us in September", demanded one college head.

The Education Secretary, whose speech opened the conference on Thursday took a hard line on further education resources. To a college head who suggested that the colleges would not be able to cope because they were being starved of money, Mrs Williams said: "I don't believe that further education is any more starved than the schools or the nursery schools."

An extra 2,000 posts and a further £27m capital programme had been provided for the colleges. "I am quite sure further education is getting its fair share."

Both Mrs Williams and Mr Richard O'Brien, chairman of the Manpower Services Commission, rejected the suggestion from Mr Chris Brooks, director of Youthaid, that young people need to be prepared for a world in which they faced an increasingly high risk of unemployment.

Mrs Williams said it was not yet clear whether the current high level of youth unemployment would drop with industrial recovery and the passing of the birthrate bulge through the schools.

But Mr Fred Jarvis, general secretary of the National Union of Teachers, insisted that whatever she might say, youth unemployment was not going to disappear.

Day release next step, Mrs Williams says

The Government has decided to give some kind of day release the top priority in its plans to extend educational provision. The Education Secretary told the conference on Thursday that she has begun discussions with the Department of Employment about the form this might take.

Mrs Williams decided only at the last moment to disclose the decision. Her prepared speech had contained only a guarded reference to the fact that possible forms of day release were being suggested by "some people" and that she and the Employment ministers recognized the need for joint studies.

So her statement that the Government felt that this was "the next big step forward" and the one on which "we in education have set our sights", surprised and delighted delegates.

Two possibilities are under discussion, Mrs Williams said. These are:

1. Some kind of compulsory requirement, which was open to the fundamental objection that young adults do not learn under compulsion.
2. A right to release; employers having to release young people for a specified period if they, the young people, claimed the right.

Mrs Williams warned that there would be "very substantial" difficulties to be overcome, such as the possibility of conflict between employer and employee and the danger that young people would become even less attractive to employers. The question of compensation to employers would have to be looked at.

"It is clear that we will have to stage this movement forward, as resources allow, little by little over the next few years."

Mrs Williams said that the Government's decision to introduce means tested statutory grants for those who stayed in education from 16 to 19 was itself a very large step towards establishing the principle that they should be treated in the same way as those who were in higher education or further education over the age of 18.

She congratulated Sheffield on its decision to introduce a system of £7 a week maintenance grants without waiting for the national scheme. This would be a useful pilot for the scheme, and there was no reason why other authorities should not follow suit.

But Mrs Williams was less than congratulatory when she turned to the voucher scheme devised by Kent County Council, which she said was a completely impossible way of financing the education service. If it were limited to the maintained sector some schools would become over-subscribed, straining facilities and requiring extra teachers and temporary buildings, while others would remain half empty with their facilities under-used. She estimated the cost of such a scheme limited to the maintained sector as £400m.

If parents were allowed to use the vouchers, topping them up, for independent schools, then it would mean that while all parents were equally subsidized, the actual school place provided would be determined by the length of their purse. Mrs Williams called the idea "a lottery in which everyone pays but the best off are bound to win".

It was very important that the education service should be able to show that its resources were not being misused or directed wrongly, said Mrs Williams, turning to the highly controversial issue of sixth-form reorganization.

Denying that she wanted a single standard form of provision to be imposed by her department, she said that in many cases sixth forms were now too small to provide the full range of both conventional and non-academic courses needed. Forty per cent of sixth forms had 50 or fewer pupils, and 10 per cent 150 or more. The average in the sixth form colleges were 400 pupils.

Some way had to be found to bring sixth forms together in such a way that form size was at least 70.

They want to work

Those who say that the young are unemployed because they do not want to work are wrong, the chairman of the Manpower Services Commission, Mr Richard O'Brien, told the conference. Surveys carried out by the commission provided clear evidence of the persistent attempts by most youngsters to find jobs, and their readiness to undertake any training that would help them do so.

It was the state of the labour market, not the attitude of young people, that had changed in recent years.

The strong motivation among young people had to be tied closely to the vocational preparation which should ease the transition from school to work. Such preparation should be broad-based, encouraging flexibility and versatility, and concentrating on such basic skills as: the ability to read, write, and communicate in writing; competence in the key arithmetical processes; manual dexterity in the use of tools by both sexes; and certain social skills, in particular the ability to communicate adequately in speech, and to listen and understand.

And if there is none?

Industry's main speaker, Mr Jim Deboo, group training manager of Baker Perkins, and a member of the CBI education committee, called the current schemes for the young unemployed "praiseworthy but palliative".

What would happen to youngsters if they were better prepared for the transition from school to work and found no jobs available for them? If we were unable to secure a massive expansion in manufacturing and the many services which Britain was uniquely capable of providing for the world, then other ways must be found of employing people.

Answering an attack by Mr Peter Ashby, of the National Union of Students, on employers' reluctance to contribute to the cost of schemes for young workers, Mr Deboo said industry had to begin thinking more seriously about ways of producing the required funds.

But, defending employers' insistence on formal qualifications for certain jobs (the subject of outspoken criticism earlier by Mr Jack Chambers, NUT executive member), Mr Deboo said: "We have to get into young people's minds that there are jobs for which we have to pass exams and be seen to be qualified."

Unions braced for grants fight

A clear hint that the TUC will fight hard against any attempt by the Government to lay down what courses youngsters must take to qualify for maintenance grants was given by Marie Patterson, chairman of the TUC's education committee.

Earlier in the conference the Education Secretary had again used the phrase "relevant courses" in referring to the grants proposals—as she did when she announced the scheme last month. Mrs Patterson said that the battle for mandatory grants was not yet completely won "for there are those who would restrict their availability to a narrow range of courses.

"I can assure this conference that the TUC will impress upon the Government the need for such grants to be available for all full time courses for young people", she added.

City and Guilds set to streamline courses

The City and Guilds of London Institute, which celebrates its centenary this year, is likely to give formal approval next month to a simpler system of examination certificates. This was announced by Mr Harry Knutton, director-general of the CGLI, in a paper presented this week to a conference of the Association of Colleges of Further and Higher Education in Torquay.

Mr Knutton said the new system would allow any school leaver, even one with poor CSE or GCE passes, to "advance through a simpler and better understood system of City and Guilds education and training qualifications".

Because of the work of the Technician Education Council and Business Education Council in reorganizing further education qualifications, it had now become necessary for the City and Guilds to rationalize some of its existing schemes.

There will be a closer link between what a student studies in college and any training he undergoes on his employer's premises, and those who reach the top of this route as advanced craftsmen and craftswomen will be able to qualify as Licentiates of the CGLI and will be eligible for the Insignia Award.

There are already some combined awards with industry, such as the Electrician's Certificate and the National Craftsman's Certificate for Motor Vehicle Mechanics. But the extension of this idea should lead to closer cooperation between further education and industrial training requirements.

Mr Knutton also referred to several recent developments aimed specially at the less academic school leaver, such as the City and Guilds Foundation Courses; and their new General Employment Award. This award has arisen out of the CGLI cooperation in the unified vocational preparation scheme. It is based on an integrated programme of education and training, with the accent on the practical side.

The CGLI had also put up a plan to the Manpower Services Commission to provide qualifications for unemployed young people on work experience schemes. The General Employment Award might also be adapted for this group.

Words, not deeds, over adult education

Continuing or adult education is now going through the stage that comprehensive education went through in the 1960s with everyone paying it lip service, it was said this week.

In a paper presented to the conference, Naomi McIntosh, pro-vice-chancellor of the Open University and member of the new adult education advisory council, said there was much discussion on the subject.

"Sadly, though, I do not see any real pressures yet for recurrent education", she said. Unemployment, although bad, was not yet bad enough.

"Most of the government money in this area is going into training through the Manpower Services Commission. The trades unions, an important force, are just, but only just, waking up to the need for a concerted demand for the wider provision of education for working adults."

Exams 'have outlived usefulness'

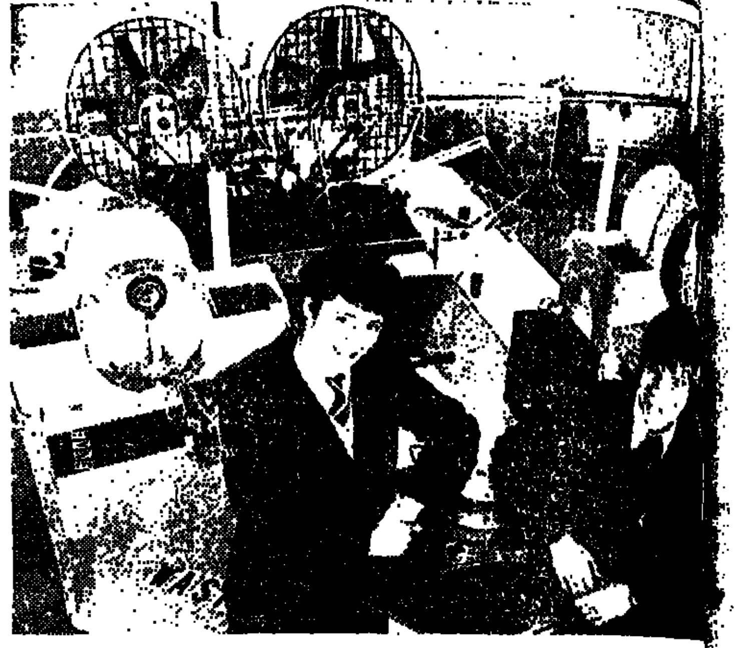
The style and nature of our examination system must be rethought if we are to do anything about the so-called under-achievement of pupils, said the Inner London Education Authority's staff inspector in a conference paper.

Mr Eric Bourne suggested that examinations may have outlived their usefulness, except as a way of selecting students for university. Employers liked them, but perhaps this is because they are the only yardstick available. "This can hardly be an argument for maintaining that some alternative arrangement might not be more informative, more relevant and, conceivably, more predictive", he said.

It was remarkable that a system with such a limited purpose should have gained such wide respect and, despite the evidence, been able to dominate the direction and values of non-university education.

Further education might be able to provide some answers, he said, because it offers a balance of basic educational skills and learning for a specific purpose. Mr Bourne gave an example of how the ILEA had been able to change conventional practice by relaxing conditions of entry for courses—to get blacks into social work.

He also showed how ILEA had failed to persuade the City and Guilds to introduce continuous assessment rather than end-of-term examinations for a syllabus it piloted with the institute. "The notion inherent in this syllabus—that individual student progress might merit recognition and that teachers might be trusted to make accurate judgments—was, alas, too much even for this institution", he said.



Flying higher: a hovercraft crop sprayer designed by Paul Brow Alistair Wolf, sixth-formers at Royal Grammar School, Newcastle won joint first prize in a European competition organized by Ph Electronics. It previously took first place in the BBC's Young Sci of the Year Competition.

Parents overawed by 'expert

Parents confidence in their ability to bring up their children has been undermined by growing numbers of professionals, says Dr Mia Kellmer Pringle, director of the National Children's Bureau.

Laymen tend to be in awe of professional "experts" and may have difficulty in marshalling their thoughts in strange surroundings, she writes in Concern, the bureau's journal.

Because of the stress involved in a special interview, parents do not always give an adequate account of the reasons for their concern about their children.

And professional workers often underestimate parent edge and insight.

The bureau has produced the lopment guide for 0 to 5 designed to redress the bala providing practical guideline parents and others. Intended to pen awareness of children's It provides teachers, parents, group leaders and nursery with a tool for monitoring tering development.

Romania, much in the news this week, has an education system tied firmly to industrial needs

Socialist heartland with a selective heart

In Romania education is secular, state-organized and unitary. This one would expect of a socialist state. It is at a subtler level that the surprises come for those who have tended to associate socialist educational policy (or its British version) with an antipathy, if not an aversion, towards selection, meritocracy and early specialization. Not so in Romania.

Compulsory education begins at six, though there are nursery schools for three to six year olds. Provision ranges from a half-day attendance for a pre-school education programme, to a weekly programme ensuring the children's education and care from Monday to Saturday.

Children receive primary education for eight years, one or two years more than their British counterparts. Schools operate on a shift system supported by a substantial amount of homework: the younger children from 8 am to 1 pm and the older children from 1 pm to 6 pm.

The same curriculum is followed through the country and, although basic, even at this stage an emphasis on application and production is detectable. A child would learn subtraction through problems such as: "In a factory workers started to install a machine at 10.50 and finished at 1.15. How long did installation of this machine take?"

It is, however, at the secondary level that the greatest contrast with the British system and its evolution of comprehensive schools occurs. Two years of secondary education are compulsory (giving a total of 10 years' compulsory education), but it can extend for four or five years.

Within it there are several types of specialized schools. Those for agriculture, economics, forestry, humanities and science are of four years' duration, while those for health studies, industry and teacher-training are of five. Some secondary schools have special sections for maths, physics, chemistry, biology, languages and art.

There are also vocational secondary schools (two to three years) which train skilled workers and are followed by in-plant apprenticeships.

At the tertiary level, particularly higher education, the impact of a centrally planned economy becomes apparent. Not only are the number of medical and teacher-training places determined by the Government, as in Britain, but engineering, science, economics and all else is determined by the Government in accordance with the economic plan for the five-year period.

This predetermined number of places are allocated on the basis of a competitive exam. The candidates who obtain top marks are selected and receive a full grant irrespective of parents' income. Other candidates who are offered places receive grants related to parents' income.

The importance of marks obtained in exams in Romania shows itself in other aspects of higher education. When projects are undertaken, for instance in electrical engineering, all of them are listed, and the student with the highest mark has first choice.

This can result in the top students all opting for aspects of modern electronics which tend to be taught by the younger academics while the older professors, teaching electrical power, get with the worst students—an outcome that does not make the system wildly popular.

The benefits that high marks bring are also apparent when it comes to employment. The top student has first choice of all the available jobs.

One cannot but be impressed by the determination with which the state's policy of linking education and research with production is pursued. During their six-day week students maintain contact with a manufacturing or marketing enterprise and spend one day each week in the enterprise for the first two years of their course.

In their third year the students spend extended periods in production units, especially during the summer holidays. In their fourth and fifth years a design or development project which has been ordered by a manufacturing enterprise is undertaken.

However, probing beneath the surface would seem to suggest that only about one third of the projects are contracts from industry.

The curriculum is also shaped by the policy of integrating education and production through what is termed the principle of double subordination. Each department is subordinate to two ministries: the Ministry of Education and another ministry such as energy or chemistry.

The pattern of continuing education in Romania contrasts with Britain in two ways. There is probably less opportunity there than in Britain to qualify professionally later in life. The emphasis is on providing a good first chance rather than providing a variety of avenues for a second chance.

Despite this, the emphasis on mid-career education is very much greater than in Britain. By law, every five years employees have to attend a course. This applies to the highest levels in Romanian bureaucracy and industry.

Although in the centrally planned economy of Romania, by definition, there is no unemployment, one suspects it is not exempt from unforeseen aspects of technological and economic change leading to underemployment and outmoded qualifications. Certainly the emphasis in higher education has moved from the narrow specialization, which was deemed necessary in earlier years to get the economy on its feet, to a much greater concentration on fundamentals.

Like Britain, and indeed other European countries, the rapid expansion of education is past in Romania. New orientations, rather than new buildings, are the pattern for the future.

Entertainments

What's a Scavenger's Daughter? Who was the last man to be beheaded in Britain? How many crimes were punishable by death in the 17th Century? The answers to these questions can be found at the London Dungeon. This permanent and graphic exhibition of British Mediaeval History is proving a must for school children. The history is authentic and the atmosphere fascinating. Quite unlike an 'ordinary' museum, this is a visit which combines fact with fun.

Girls put clampdown on politics to the test

ATHENS

The Greek Ministry of Education has banned all political activity in secondary schools and urged teachers to ensure that the outside school behaviour of their pupils conforms with the rules.

A stern circular from the ministry warned against "the premature and constant preoccupation of school-children with political or trade-unionist activities." This, it said, deflected them from the basic objectives of education.

The ministry ordered severe punishment of school-children engaging in political activities which, it said, were incompatible with the very essence of education, damaged the prestige of schools, and evoked understandable anxiety among parents. The circular pointed out that the setting up of pupils' committees engaged in political or trade-union activities was, therefore, a punishable offence.

It was put to the acid test all the pupils of the Girls' Ly Ierapetra, on the island of C boycotted classes for a week solidarity for three girls sus for eight days in complian these orders.

Australia

$50m plan to help immigrants settle

from John Kirkaldy

SYDNEY

The federal government is to finance the most extensive upgrading of services to immigrants undertaken since the war.

Over the next three years this will cost $A50m (£29,100,000) and will include many education programmes to help immigrants settle in Australia.

Among the schemes envisaged are improvements to settlement programmes, health services, language and education classes, employment opportunities, child-minding and interpreter facilities and upgraded ethnic radio and television.

The money is in addition to the $A53m already being spent on immigrant services and will significantly boost the budget of the Department of Immigration and Ethnic Affairs in the new financial year.

This is of particular importance as most experts are predicting a tough budget with considerable cutting back in many other government programmes.

The changes come as a result of recommendations recently presented to the federal parliament by a committee headed by a Melbourne solicitor, Mr Frank Galbally, which investigated immigrant services and programmes.

It was the first report to have been tabled in language other than English. Copies were also printed in Arabic, Dutch, German, Greek, Italian, Serbo-Croation, Spanish, Turkish and Vietnamese.

Immigrants represent one of the most important social and educational problems facing Australia. Although they bring enormous advantages in the long-term in terms of economic growth and a diversity of culture, there are the more immediate difficulties of language and different life styles.

Immigrants (legal and illegal) although greatly reduced in number from the "populate or perish" days just after the war are still coming in at about 70,000 a year.

They have recently been brought to national attention by the arrival in Darwin of a number of boats bringing refugees from Vietnam. Many immigrants still face hostility from Australians who continue to be dominated by the old "white Australia" ethos.

The committee formulated four basic principles which have been accepted by the federal government. These are:

- All members of society should have an equal opportunity to realize their full potential and must have equal access to programmes and services
- Every person should be able to maintain his or her culture without prejudice or disadvantage and should be encouraged to understand and embrace other cultures
- Needs of immigrants should be met by programmes and services available to the whole community, but special programmes are at present necessary to ensure equality of access for immigrants
- Services and programmes should be designed and operated in full consultation with users and self-help should be encouraged as much as possible.

The main provision of the new programme is an improved settlement scheme, costing A$23m over the next three years, which will include classes of English and formal orientation courses including advice and assistance on housing, education, employment and other areas of need.

The new initiatives will also include spending A$10m over the same period to upgrade the quality of English language teaching in schools, including extra teachers, new materials and the development of new fast-learning processes.

English classes at work will be available for more immigrant men and women and immigrant housewives will be able to use an improved home-tutor scheme. Working immigrant women will be able to use new child-minding facilities provided for them at the work place.

Ethnic radio stations will also receive A$3,280,000 to improve their services in the next three years. The three-year phasing in process of ethnic television will involve prolonged consultation but the government has allocated A$7,300,000 to be spent by 1981.

Italy

Specialist schools may close

from Dalbert Hallenstein

MILAN

Music education in Italy will be transformed if the recently approved Secondary School Reform Bill is passed by parliament as it stands. Music now plays no part in the curriculum of the secondary schools, though the conservatories are technically considered specialized secondary schools.

The Bill proposes abolishing the existing system of specialized secondary schools issuing professional diplomas. They will be replaced by a system resembling the English comprehensives.

Secondary schools will share a common group of compulsory and voluntary subjects, but will be divided into various "orientations" for the final three years. These will include schools orientated towards literature, the sciences, history and social sciences and the arts.

The conservatories will be absorbed by schools with an arts orientation, thus offering music to vast numbers of secondary pupils who are now totally excluded from the subject.

The reform will also enrich the curriculum of the conservatories which are now almost completely devoted to subjects related to music. Until now conservatory students, who usually enrol at 13, have received no further education in such basic subjects as maths, languages, science and general history and geography.

The inclusion of the conservatories in the secondary school system will rectify this situation which has tended to produce excellent musicians who are often deprived of basic skills.

The proposed reform has been welcomed by many musicians.

Tertiary stu places 'shou be increased

by David Dungworth

West Germany's top advisory on higher education, the A Science Council has co strongly in favour of ex expansion in the tertiary se

A meeting of the council consider the Eight Buildin gramme for Institutions of Education has recommended the number of study places be increased from the p 732,000 to about 800,000 b the cost of achieving this ta estimated at Dm2,200m (over £560m).

Further growth after 198 bring the number of places the 850,000 agreed by the fe the Länder governments at of last year.

The recommendations have made in spite of a recent ing in the demand for hi cation. Between 1975 number of new entrants and universities dropped by cent.

Among new male students fall was 4.2 per cent but th compensated by a rise of cent in the number of entrants. Last year 39 per cent first year students were compared with only 26 per 1965, and they now form cent of the total college popu

The possibility that many new places will remain unf discounted by the council, points out that the annual of grammar school leavers peak in 1983 and 1984 but to be higher than at prese almost the end of the 1980s.

Acceptance of the council's posals would help to ease the tion in university depar where there is chronic ove ing. A numerus clausus rently in force throughout eral republic in architecture logy, dentistry, medicine, macy, psychology and ve surgery.

The arts and science coun advocates a partial change role of the universities. As uates experience increasing culty in finding employm their traditional professions education should aim to them with a broader basis of ledge which would equip enter "the middle range of pations".

The emphasis should be on expanding faculties and social sciences, since in these disciplines tend more flexible in their choi career than engineering or sci Physical education, mus the creative arts should loped and graduates encou take up posts in further ed sports clubs and organizatio cerned with promoting cul leisure activities instead of ing their aspirations teaching.

There should, however, general expansion in eng and natural sciences as these departments already filled places.

Dog-fight for state tax surplus

Ian Anderson reports from Stanford on the effects of the Californian taxpayers' revolt

STANFORD

California's wealthiest school districts, and by implication those of greatest quality, will be the biggest losers following the state taxpayers' revolt which slashed $7 billion off the annual property tax revenue of local government.

This is the opinion of Dr Michael Kirst, president of the California Board of State Education, which sets educational policy for the state's grade schools and high schools.

Dr Kirst, who is also an education professor at Stanford University, predicts that there will be a move to private schooling as a result of the passage on June Six of the Jarvis-Gann propositon which limits local property tax to 1 per cent of assessed value.

Dr Kirst says that the move will happen in the wealthy school districts where property tax revenue has no where decimated. Before Jarvis-Gann these districts could raise far more revenue in property tax than poorer disrtricts.

Under Jarvis-Gann, even if the poorer districts also lose property tax revenue, they can expect to be bailed out by the state to the level of $1,300 per pupil, the state target for spending.

The wealthy districts can only expect state help to this level. In the past, many of these districts were able to raise more than $2·000 per pupil from their own property tax sources which could now be cut as much as 70 per cent.

The situation is further complicated by the Serrano decision in the California Supreme Court which ruled that educational spending must be equalized among school districts.

According to Dr Kirst, educational policy-makers had hoped to raise poorer schools up to the standards of the wealthier disrtricts: after Jarvis Gann the levelling could occur in reverse.

Jarvis-Gann also means that the state must come to the rescue of the local school districts. Dr Kirst is concerned that this will herald the loss of independence for the districts and mean a greater shift of power to the state.

The dog-fight over allocation of state money to local services, including schools, began in Sacramento, the state capital, immediately after Jarvis-Gann was passed. The state legislature must decide on the allocation of the $5 billion left in property tax revenue after Jarvis Gann and the $5 billion in the state surplus. The deadline is July 2, the beginning of the 1978-79 fiscal year.

The greatest loser in education will be the junior colleges which face a cut of $558m, or 40 per cent of their total annual revenue, unless state aid is forthcoming. The school system is likely to be regarded by the state legislature as more important than the colleges which may be forced to curtail their non-credit courses.

Wilson Riles, the Superintendent of Public Instruction, has urged that at least $2 billion of the state surplus be allocated to the school system; this would maintain school finance at about 85 per cent of the present level.

The president of the Los Angeles Board of Education, Howard Miller, has said that L.A. schools may not open in September unless the state legislature restores money lost through Jarvis-Gann. The L.A. District, one of the state's wealthiest, stands to lose $754 million, or 74 per cent of its operating budget.

Beyond the immediate financial considerations, the passage of Jarvis-Gann means that with less money available, educational priorities will have to be reviewed. It is possible that special projects such as help to disadvantaged students and bilingual classes will be curtailed.

Algeria

English becoming second language

English could soon replace French as the next most important language after Arabic in Algeria. A recent article in the official weekly magazine of the single Algerian political party, the Front de Libération Nationale, said, "The next 10 years should see English take the place of French."

No government directives have yet been issued, partly because some subjects are still taught in French at the primary level and partly because, particularly at the secondary level, Algeria still relies very heavily on French teachers.

But it is clear which way the wind is blowing. Two months ago, at the opening of the Arzew gas liquefaction plant, President Boumedienne spoke in Arabic, but his energy minister spoke in English. And national and local administrators all speak of the crying need for greater English language fluency.

At the moment, three-quarters of secondary schoolchildren, who already know French, opt for English as the next language.

Republic of Ireland

Priests take dismissal challenge to High Court

from John Walshe

DUBLIN

A long-awaited action has begun in Dublin's High Court in which two former priests and staff members of St Patrick's College, Maynooth, are challenging the powers of the college trustees to dismiss them.

The dismissal of Dr P. J. McGrath, professor of general metaphysics, and Mr Malachy O'Rourke, lecturer in modern languages, last year led to a one-day strike by the majority of staff in the college.

St Patrick's is a national seminary for the education of aspirants to the priesthood. It has the status of Pontifical university and is also recognized college of the National University of Ireland.

In the 1976-77 academic year it had 1,582 students, 30 of whom were sutdying for thep riesthood. St Patrick's is governed by a board of 17 trustees, all of whom are bishops.

In the High Court it was stated for the plaintiffs that the charges against hem which led to their dismissals were not clear. In the case of Dr McGrath they appeared to consist of publishing writings prejudicial to ecclesiastical authority and to the interests of the college and failing to comply with a directive concerning the wearing of clerical garb.

For Mr O'Rourke the charges appear to be: failure to resign his office in the college as required by a Papal edict on laicisation, failure to wear clerical garb as required by the directive of the college president and failure to reside on the campus.

Both plaintiffs alleged that the proceedings taken against them by the trustees constituted "invidious discrimination".

Sweden

More power for parents

from Colin Narbrough

STOCKHOLM

A circular from the Department of Education proposes more influence for pupil-parent groups in questions concerning schools' daily activities and environment.

Political responsibility for schools and their work will, however, continue to be in the hands of parliament, the government and the National Board of Schools.

The memorandum gives a chance for schools councils to make significant decisions. It complements a proposal of principles for school councils, worked out by the Education Department. This proposed that the councils should be composed of 50 per cent pupils or parents and 50 per cent staff. Greater definition is now given regarding the councils' tasks and areas of responsibility. It also puts forward proposals on the necessary legislation required.

The tasks of the schools councils listed in the memorandum are: to provide information to pupils and parents about workings of the schools, to act as a forum in which pupils, parents, staff and the headmaster can discuss common problems, to create a possibility for pupils, parents and staff to consult the headmaster before he makes decisions affecting the pupils, and to make it possible to reach joint decisions in certain questions.

The Education Department document says the councils should submit budget proposals. They should make their views known before board of schools decisions to close school units and express views on principles of the distibution of pupils within schools, classes and groups, and on questions concerning school hours, absenteeism, testimonials and school meals.

It also has the right to submit proposals concerning educational material. The proposed powers of decision cover questions of principle on timetable planning, the use of school premises, lunchtimes, the timing of examinations and the division of the school into working units.

Legislation concerning the councils will be assembled into a special Schools Council Bill and the councils should be operative fromt he spring term of 1979.

Holland

Minister forms more single lower schools

from John Richardson

THE HAGUE

Education Minister Dr Arie Pais has taken an important step towards restructuring education for all children aged from four to 12 years.

The introduction of a single lower school to accommodate those who at present attend infants (four to six years), junior (six to 12) or special schools for slow learners and the physically handicapped, was one of the least controversial concepts among the sweeping package of reforms fought for by the previous socialist minister Dr Jos van Kemenade (TES April 7 1978).

Some 847 schools have been chosen to form 400 experimental combinations in the school year 1978-79. This is a fourfold increase in the number of schools participating.

Of these 432 are infants schools, 407 junior schools and eight special schools. The schools have been chosen on the basis of project plans sent in, in response to an invitation from the minister.

This stimulus had been aimed specially at the 103 infant schools, 97 junior schools and one special school currently participating in the experiments, the 57 infant schools and 54 junior schools which unsuccessfully applied least year, groups of schools already cooperating in other curriculum developments and special schools nominated by local inspectors. Seven of the latter group are to be included in the coming year's activities.

Successful project proposals were also received from the cities of Amsterdam (13 infant and 12 junior to form 12 combinations), Enschede (13-13-13), The Hague (12-12-12), Groningen (18-15-15), Rotterdam (16-15-15), and Utrecht (15-15-15). One rural district, Zeeland, will also be included with 15 infant schools and 13 junior schools, making 13 combined units.

It is hoped that broadening the experiment will have far-reaching effects in encouraging systematic thinking on curriculum reform for younger children. Special attention will be paid to planning at the school level with the aim of making educational experiences appropriate to the needs and aptitudes of the individual child.

From the beginning of August this year an extra materials allowance of 2,000 guilders (£500) per school will be available. Structured attempts will be made to spread the benefits of the experience gained, and detailed records will be kept.

Maths tests fail the testers

Sir,—Colin Selby ("Maths under the microscope", May 12) repeats the conventional statement that the Assessment of Performance Unit's monitoring programme is designed both to reflect the work actually going on in classrooms and to minimize the backwash effect. The first round of testing has now taken place, and so it is appropriate to consider whether these aims have been realized.

The unit's current way of minimizing the backwash is simply not to reveal what is being tested. This has, from its point of view, the added advantage that the content and balance of the tests remain beyond criticism. There might be a case for defending this approach if the tests did reflect the best current practice, but the maths tests just taken by a national sample of 11-year-olds do not, in my view, meet this requirement.

Perhaps this is not surprising. The NFER (which is administering the tests) has not had the benefit of any recent and systematic survey of what the schools are actually doing, and the representation on its steering group of people with direct recent experience of the primary classroom is pitifully small.

When the pilot tests of primary maths were carried out last October I was able to see the test papers in one of the schools which took part. Because I was so alarmed by what I saw, I took a full copy of them. They had clearly been prepared in haste and contained a number of errors: ambiguities, mathematical and logical errors, badly drawn diagrams, poorly laid out questions, and division signs typed so that they looked like addition signs.

But this was not all. The balance of topics was very odd, which could be explained to some extent by the fact that these were only pilot tests. Some topics, however, were omitted altogether, or were represented only by a single question, and this could not be rectified without destroying the purpose of the pilots.

The test papers also revealed the monitoring team's answers to the problems that anyone responsible for constructing such tests has to face: whether to use weight or mass, whether to include Imperial units and if so which ones, which algebra notation to use, and so on. These answers did not inspire confidence.

The tests which have just been carried out are much better than this, at least so far as bad questions are concerned. Many, including all the ones I considered to be quite indefensible, have been omitted. A considerable number of new questions have appeared, and it is not clear that these have been piloted at all, though the APU booklet, Monitoring Mathematics, implies that all items used in May have been piloted.

The new items certainly have their share of ambiguities and at least one error, in addition to the one pointed out in an erratum slip. Some of the ambiguous and poorly worded pilot questions remain, "kilogram" is still spelt wrongly in one question, and the typing is still not as clear as it should be. Doubts about terminology and units are by no means dispelled, though at least pupils no longer have to work out the weight in pounds of six stone Alice.

The APU has published some information about the balance of major topics: the number of items in each of 13 sub-categories is said to be roughly proportional to the size of the corresponding rectangle in a diagram in Monitoring Mathematics. (Reproduced in the TES, May 12.) But this is not so. One of the smallest rectangles corresponds with a sub-category which has (equally with two others) the highest number of separately-marked items; the largest rectangle corresponds with the sub-category which ranks eighth in its number of items.

The diagram is of rather limited value anyhow. Because of problems of definition, many items do not fit unambiguously into a particular sub-category. But the sheer inaccuracy of the statement made about it renders the diagram quite useless as a basis for discussion of this vital matter.

It appears from Colin Selby's article that the unit is having second thoughts about the method of analysis to be used for the test results. Since the whole exercise has been designed with the Rasch method in mind, it will be difficult to change to a new one now.

But it is easy to see, on looking at the complexity (and a few anomalies) of the 78 different sub-tests, why a change is being considered. Either way, the results will clearly be of limited value as a consequence of the analytical constraints alone.

It is time for a reappraisal. It is time for Tom Marjoram as head of the unit, to start taking some notice of responsible criticism. It is time that the professional associations (who are not noted for letting apparently unaccountable outside bodies take such liberties on matters within their sphere) demanded to know what is going on. It is time for the unit's over-inflated publicity bubble to be burst, and for the reality beneath it to be exposed.

Rash claims for Rasch

Sir,—You refer (May 12) to our criticism of the methods to be used by the Government's Assessment of Performance Unit (APU), and say that they are taking these criticisms seriously. This indeed, is true, and several different views were represented at a conference held in December to discuss the contentious issue of "Item Banking", and its basis in the statistical technique known as the "Rasch Model".

What originally concerned us, and caused us to voice publicly our doubts about the methods to be used, were exaggerated claims for the Rasch Model being made by the NFER. These were particularly dangerous in our view since the NFER had been given responsibility for much of the unit's monitoring programme, yet was apparently about to apply an unproven technique with no serious validation of it. While the unit's conference reassured us that the APU was keen to have a free ranging debate on this issue, we are still concerned about how this issue is to be resolved.

We welcome the agreement by the end of the conference that if Item Banking had to be abandoned, a more traditional approach would be used, and there also seemed to be a general agreement that educational criteria rather than purely mathematical ones would have priority.

Nevertheless, someone has to decide when the Rasch Model is no longer adequate, and it is our view that this is not amateur which can be left to the supporters of this particular technique. We hope, therefore, that the APU will continue to promote a very wide discussion of this issue well outside the sphere of its own committees and advisory groups. s we have emphasized elsewhere, far from being simply a technical issue, this debate lies at the very heart of the APU's programme.

Carry on experimenting

Sir,—I kept on wanting to like Mr Morris in the same way as he tried to like In and Out of School but I have been no more successful than he was in his review on May 26. Above the Morris review appears one by Geoffrey Parkinson who has reservations about Illich but at least there is an attempt, quite humbly, to look at a real problem. Of course there are many other experiments and of course some schools cope with them better than others but you can't have it both ways: complain at conferences about truancy, bad behaviour and increasing violence and knock with a mixture of paternalism and "auntie knows best" two "zealots" who furthermore have the audacity to be young.

Don't we all want smaller classes and teaching in small groups? Why then sneer at White and Brockington for doing just this? It is a particular skill that can be learnt and I am grateful to the RSLA project for providing such an opportunity. The project benefits both the children and potential teachers and it has the support of quite a few local teachers; also it avoids some of the idiocies of the root and branch de-schoolers. A book that describes this fairly unpretentious experiment in education deserves better than the review it got.

Environmental kits

Sir,—The review by John Tranter (June 2) of environmental kits was informative and timely. However, it would be unfortunate if the review inadvertantly left anyone with the impression that courses in environmental science or environmental studies could not, or should not, be contemplated without such hardware.

Priced at over £220, they are surely an out-of-reach luxury for most schools, but could be possible purchases for l.e.a.s and university education departments and made available to local schools on the rare occasions that they are needed.

It is important to remember that a great deal of valuable investigative work can be done within the minimum of simple, inexpensive equipment, much of which is readily available in schools. It is easy to undervalue such activity when faced with manufacturers advocating the electronic way of life. Those of us concerned with environmental education, at whatever level, will neglect simplicity and the use of the human senses at the peril of our subject.

In-service: a happy tale

Sir,—Having read the two articles "The cost of Common Sense" and "In Praise of Competition" (June 1), in the first of which Norman Evans made the plea for in-service training to spring from within the school, so that "it might then lead to a corporate professional enterprise with less emphasis on the division between those who provide in-service work and those for whom it is provided", and in the second of which David Hopkinson chided schools and education authorities for seeing parents as "potential nuisances to be kept at bay or as patients or clients . . . all too rarely as customers", I see two related themes, mainly as a result of my own school's recent experience of a one-day in-service course.

The school on the brink of reorganization from a Sheshire secondary modern to an 11-18 comprehensive, with attendant expansion of staffing numbers, facilities and curricular provision, was felt by some of the staff to be in need of a short in-service training course on the subject of curriculum planning and design.

However, as the planning of the course, and its implementation proved, the fact that it had been planned from within,using some of the existing expertise of the staff, with unobstrusive support from the advisory service, did lead to "a corporate enterprise" on the day, in a true workshop atmosphere.

The second, apparently unrelated, chord, of increasing parents' awareness of the school and its life and treating them as "customers", was struck in the afternoon's session, in which an exercise, unrelated to subject, was set on a curriculum design problem to be tackled by groups of staff.

The staff was set the problem of designing a short curriculum, not for the pupils, but for the parents of the pupils, the aim of which was to foster a greater knowledge and awareness of the life and work of the school.

he task was attacked with such energy by the workshop groups that I am sure would not have been evident if a more mundane curriculum exercise had been set.

The products of their discussion, the ideas, organization and content that were displayed at the end of the day's work, were such that the district adult education organizer present on the course felt that it would be a pity of the "simulation exercise' 'were not implemented. The opportunity has been grasped to bring parents into the school throughout the next academic year as "students" on a course about their children's school.

What I have been describing could be classed as a happy accident. The real point is, however, that an in-service course, developed from within, with outside support, leads to a possibly greater investment of professional commitment by the staff of the school, and in this particular case improves relationships with the parent community

Records and Warnock

Sir , Chapte r four o f the Warnock report is entitled Discovery, Assessment and Recording, and it discusses the multiporfessional assessment which should be made of all children with special learning difficulties, the profile of the child's needs and a recommendation of the form of the provision of special help, a separate note on how there commendation is being met in practice, and the name of a person designated by the multiprofessional team to provide a point of contact for the parents.

Paragraph 4:70 states that documents on all the poinst listed above "will form the record of the child". The report then continues: "The parents should have ready access to the documents comprising the record of their own child".

While it will be interesting to see to what extent all or any of the recommendations of the Warnock report will be implimented, this one has particular significance.

The Warnock report deals with children with learning difficulties throughout Great Britain. The whole emphasis of this report is to integrate these children as much as possible into the ordinary schools. At present different authoritiew keep different records concerning pupils, and the accessibility of these records to parents differs. If this particular recommendation is accepted it will result in the parents of children with "learning difficulties" being privileged.

If it is considered desirable that the parents of children with "learning difficulties" should have ready access to the records kept on their children is it not also desirable that the parents of all children should have ready access to the records kept on their hildren by educational authorities?

Perhaps the time is now ripe for a wider discussion to take place in which clarification of what documents are kept by educational authorities on all children is disclosed to the general public.

Opinions of clergy

Sir,—Peter Hebblethwaite's review of our Clergy, Ministers and Priests (May 26) was terse and testy. The book may well be both flawed in analysis and conclusion and graceless in style but, as a reviewer, Mr Hebblethwaite is bound to ensure that his survey does not convey a distorted and misleading impression to the reader. On two counts, we believe it does.

In the first place, he suggests that the very basis of the book is suspect: questionnaires "casually" completed. While it is true that we had restricted ourselves to a single method, our sample was more rigorous than he allows. Within the nine dioceses and districts selected, there was a systematic canvassing of opinion, with only fully answered questionnaires being used in the analysie. All of this is comprehensively conveyed in Appendix I, together with an explanation of how the questionnaires were arrived at. Secondly, and more importantly, we should take exception to the patronizing "not surprisingly the authors demonstrate that attitudes to ecumenism . . . depend upon what . . . clergymen think their church is all about". What, however, we discovered to be of more significance and strength is the quality of the institution itself; the plausible claim that there are, for example, clergymen with radical beliefs which fundamentally cut across their separate denominations is not supported by our research.

Art with 80p brushes

Sir,—I was disturbed by the seemingly casual assumption of writers in the TES Extra on Art, Craft and Design (May 19) that the visual arts could and would continue to form an indispensable area of the curriculum. My concern is with the very serious danger that "art and design" may be priced out of the curriculum due to financial constraints.

During a recent teaching practice in an area of the north-west that ranges over several different educational authorities, I made inquiries at five fairly typical secondary schools as to their annual requisition allowances for art and design departments. I list the details below:

| School | Annual Amount | Numbers taking art in years 1-3 | Numbers taking art in years 4-6 | Average amount per pupil per annum | Average amount per lesson (40 weeks assumed) |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| A | £600 | 700 | 110 | £0.73 | £0.02 |
| B | £800 | 700 | 92 | £1.01 | £0.02½ |
| C | £780 | 800 | 118 | £0.85 | £0.02 |
| D | £700 | 360 | 102 | £1.50 | £0.04 |
| E | £1,200 | 640 | 212 | £1.38 | £0.03½ |

When it is realized that, in the current catalogue of a leading supplier, a size five general purpose paint brush costs 80p, and a ream of good quality cartridge paper £31.98 (including discount) it is easy to see the ever-increasing difficulties being faced by art and design departments.

Are heads aware, or made aware by their art staff, of the consumer intensive nature of the subject? Of the very high percentage that is spent on consumable items? And even that items nominally non-consumable, such as brushes, have only a limitud life in a busy art department?

Does a head's often enthusiastic verbal support for the visual arts equate with his-her financial support?

Are departmental allocations within a school ever discussed between heads and heads of departments in any meaningful fashion? Is it just a coincidence that the school with the highest per capita allowance was the only one of the five schools where all department totals were known?

Although I have quoted the figures from only five schools I know of many other schools where the financial situation is giving considerable cause for concern. It would be interesting to hear some other reader's views on the matter which might then shed some light on a more widespread picture.

Tangled up in Taylor

Sir,—How do the five supporters of the Taylor report (Letters, June 2) reconcile government compulsion with "equal participation" for school governors. Further, how can these same five proclaim their "public accountability concept" when a mere handful of nominated individuals, representing sectional interests, could override the elected and accountable l.e.a. members?

The political aspect plays too great a part in their approach to what should be solely a question of education. The ideas in the socialist manifesto, they say, must be "enunciated" and that the individual society 'their own society I suppose) must have an essential role in the new partnership based on the current philosophy—their philosophy.

Miss Margaret Jackson must have been confused rather than impressed when she assured this deputation of five that the Minister supported parent participation —as I am sure the majority of us do — if in the right and proper role.

The fact stands out that the proposed Taylor recommendations cannot be plain sailing. It is this situation that concerns so many of us and in a radio discussion (in which I took a part) Mrs Williams, answering my question, conceded that she, too, was confused over some of the proposals in the report and that she would arrange for further discussion with the various organizations to help in her deliberations. Even so let us not forget that the Minister is also very much in the hands of politicians.

To date I have seen no reports of such discussions and my letter to the Ministry on behalf of the Barnet Education Group asking for information in this respect to help us in our discussions has so far gone unanswered.

How Kent succeeds

Sir,—The article by Lucy Hodges, "Kent creaming turns sour" (May 19) presents an unacceptably ex parte point of view.

Admittedly Kent's "Thames-side" system, like every other type of reorganization, presents problems. For the high schools these are primarily the "transit camp" atmosphere in the first two years and the task of stimulating the pupils that remain. For the upper schools the difficulties arise in bringing all pupils up to similar standards for external examinations in a shorter period and the erratic criteria adopted by individual high schools for transfer.

Yet the scheme has positive advantages, to which certain polemicists may be blind. Without the strait-jacket of the 11 plus it has been possible to retain centres of excellence in a flexible system. Given the geographical distribution of schools in the area, the range of O and A level choice at present available would be economically impossible in self-contained comprehensive schools. If all pupils had been dispensed in a dozen schools around Maidstone, there would not have been the 24 Oxbridge awards and places obtained by one upper school alone this year.

The NUT certainly does not represent all interested parties in the teaching profession ; nor does it represent pupils or parents. Abler pupils also have rights and the nation needs their expertise. Equally parents have rights, and parental choice is a potent instrument to maintain standards. Certainly, the overwhelming majority of articulate public opinion in the Maidstone area declared itself in favour of the present scheme when the KCC arranged recent consultations.

Furthermore, the article, based on the views of a few propagandists, implicitely denigrated the majority of high schools. They have changed their image from the old secondary modern schools; many are developing fifth and sixth year courses which enable pupils to transfer into upper school sixth forms with considerable success.

Difficulties are less in the "Thames-side" system and more in agreement on transfer rates at 13 +.

Headmaster,

Sport

PE staffs 'isolated by jargon'

by Stanley Levenson

Physical education teachers are isolating themselves from the sports world with their jargon and it is no thanks to them that sport is booming, said Mr Ron Pickering, former PE teacher now a television commentator, during a seminar in London.

Many teachers have effectively gone into an ivory tower surrounded by incomprehensible technical language. The growth in sports is due to entrepreneurs, to economic factors rather than to efforts in schools.

Mr Pickering also said that fair play needed more emphasis in schools. "There is no sport without fair play, and fair play can only be learned in schools."

The seminar, organized by the Physical Education Association and the second of its kind, was aimed at improving cooperation between physical educationists and sports administrators.

Mr John Pearson, a London teacher, said colleges of education could better be kept in touch with the outside world if they attracted more coaches instead of snubbing them because they did not hold teaching qualifications.

In a crowded school, with pressure on staff and facilities, the aim should be to lay the foundation for a variety of sporting skills. Children who sought more expert and sive coaching were encourag join local clubs. L.e.a.s shou the channel for gathering in tion from governing bodies seminate in schools.

Coaches and officials, should make more use of facilities.

The seminar, sponsored by International, showed that there was a general desire for ing together there were still of principle to be aired and out.

This will be done by furth cussions between the associati governing bodies.

Heads in the clouds and feet in the water

Leighton Park School, Reading, has fo rsome years been an important force in schools canoeing and this year is no exception. Hugh Beardall and Peter Lancaster are in the British junior team, and Lucy Perrett, eighth in the world K1 junior championships in 1977, is a member of the women's senior team.

During the past six years, nine Leighton Park pupils have gained international honours—which cannot be bad for a school population of about 310.

The two boys competed recently in a sprint regatta at Ghent, Belgium where they were part of a K4 crew which gained a bronze medal over 1,000 metres.

Lucy's most recent competition was in Bratislava, Czechoslovakia, where she reached the semi-finals in the K1.

The catalyst for Leighton Park's canoe expertise is Mr Bernard Perrett, Lucy's father, the school's director of physical education. Mr Perrett is a canoe enthusiast. He looks after the national junior team and is a British Canoe Union selector.

Fortunately for Mr Perrett, the school is independent, and parents were ready to put more money into canoeing; they have 30 kayaks of their own—and there is plenty water at hand, the Thames and Kennet Avon Canal.

Canoeing is an almost activity at Leighton Park, the lers are in action somewhere weekend between February October, says Mr Perrett.

Lucy, Hugh and Peter now in the sixth form preparing their A level exams—but they have their heads and their canoeing A levels. The are preparing for next year's world championships and ambition is to compete in the Olympic Games in Moscow.

So now we are promised a Bullock style report on maths. A report of this kind will inevitably explain that some good things are happening, some bad things are happening, and that there is room for improvement. The keen, interested teachers will attend courses related to its findings; the less interested majority will continue to plough through Fletcher.

It is not reports we require, but action. We know of the difficulties concerned with modern maths . . . ask any primary school teacher. Most teachers explain the relevance of the new maths by speaking about the importance of children understanding the "oneness of one" or of "the importance of sets in this new age". They explain, somewhat vaguely, the futility of rote learning, and the importance of realizing that there can be other bases than 10.

We are often shown rows of cubes, dodecahedrons, or spheres made out of milk straws, and invariably a dazzling display of merry paper triangles cut out by busy fingers and stuck all over black paper. In spite of the teacher's words, and such visual evidence, I still fail to appreciate this "broader vision" of maths—and remain worried and unconvinced.

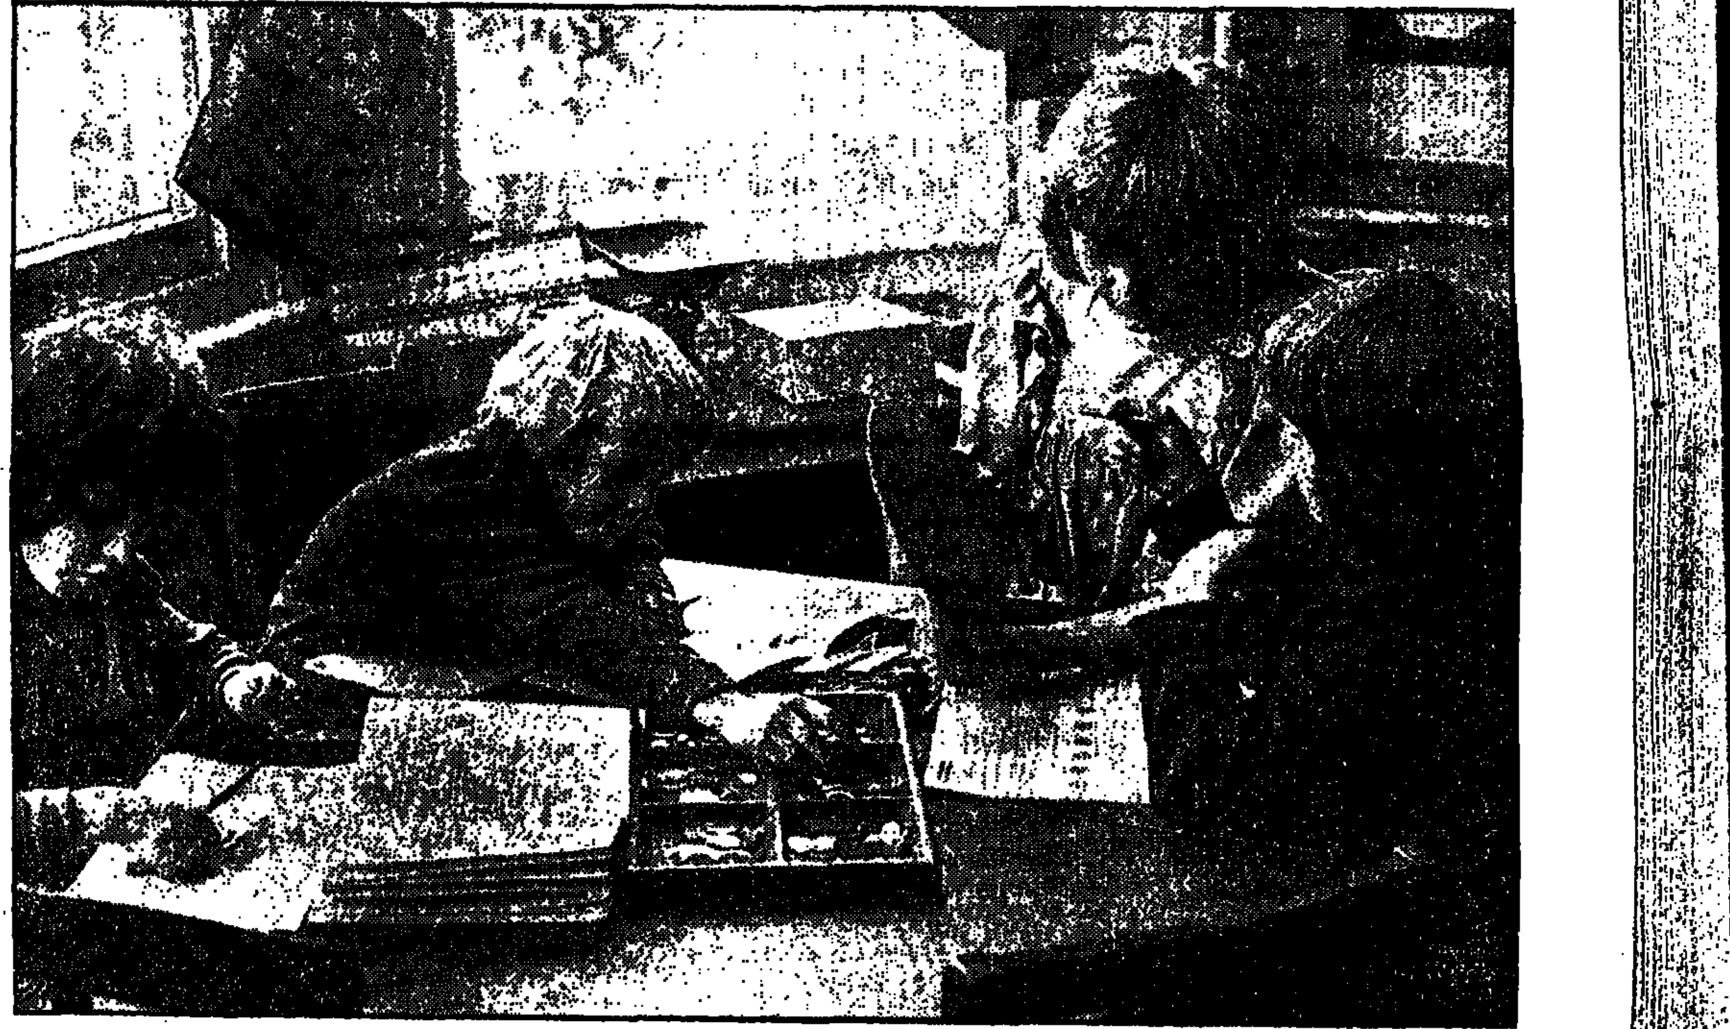
Unlike the Black Paper writers, however, I do not regret the advent of modern maths, nor do I wish for a return to the "good old days". I believe in the new approach, and I rejoice that maths has become more than mere computation.

But I wish primary school teachers had a clearer idea about what it is they are trying to accomplish. Their explanations convince me that for every teacher who has a thorough understanding of the implications of modern maths, there are 20 who work stolidly through schemes without any appreciation of why they are doing it.

The root cause of the problem lies quite firmly in our colleges of education. The nature of teacher training directly contributes to the disappointing work and confusion of thought evident in many schools. Time and time again one encounters probationary teachers scarcely able to meet the basic demands of the primary school.

Such students clutch BEd degrees with a pseudo university main course specialism, plus a file full of education notes . . . but with only a very general knowledge of how to teach reading, modern maths, or even tell a story in such a way that the child is excited. Surely after three years' work our students should go into schools full of relevant information about the latest schemes, methods, and approaches to primary education, and be bursting to put their ideas into action?

They seldom seem to be, and it is not their fault. So much time is taken up pursuing the interests of lecturers via main course studies, and theories of education through lectures and note-making, that the poor students have little time to study the professional aspect of their work. They enter schools with little more than a smattering of knowledge about modern maths and other subject areas of the primary school.



'Students enter schools with little more than a smattering of knowledge about modern primary maths.'

It is not beyond the colleges to produce teachers who can move into full-time teaching roles completely fitted to meet the demands of maths—and the range of activity in the primary day. But if they are to do so, they need to release their hold on a few of the sacred cows they have clutched to their bosoms since the turn of the century. One is the "Main Subject", the other "Education Studies".

Main subjects are usually taught by lecturers with a genuine love and deep understanding of their discipline, who enjoy the opportunity offered by colleges to work at a level a little higher than that at which most of them taught in secondary schools. Prospective primary teachers spend about a third of their time studying nineteenth-century literature, painting, physical science or similar subject-matter "in depth".

The theory is that, although they are only going to teach children between the ages of three and 13, the study of a main subject extends their minds, assists their personal development, and gives them special insight into the subject, thereby enabling them to teach it efficiently.

Similarly, the education tutors enjoy the opportunity of dividing the education process into its constituent parts, and imparting information about the psychological, philosophical and sociological aspects. This takes another third of our student's time.

The remaining time is devoted to "Professional Studies" or "Curriculum Studies". Here every subject specialist negotiates for an opportunity to explain how to actually teach music, art, drama, physical education, religious education, environmental studies, science, dance, maths, reading, lettering, etc, etc. Since there is never enough time for every subject to get its slice of the cake, subject tutors find that a willing but confused group of students are sent along to a particular department for their brief dose of "how to teach" art, music, maths or whatever.

The tutor may be dazzled by the amount he is supposed to cover in such a brief time, but bravely battles forward, endeavouring to give students some understanding of what it will be like to have 30 children spending 50 per cent of their time doing art-type activities, or how to face up to five days a week of number work with a mixed-ability, vertically grouped class for 30 weeks a year.

Of course the whole thing is ridiculous and impossible, but while this is occurring small groups are sitting with main course tutors quietly studying Milton, Jewish Law, or the effect of Celadion Glazes. Of course a case can be made for such academic study. Of course it is valuable. Of course it is demanding . . . but can we honestly afford the time?

It is an inexcusable state of affairs, but it is likely to continue, because tutors and colleges enjoy the kudos of main subject studies, whereas the professional or curriculum work has an unacademic, low-status association. Many tutors are honest enough to admit to the fact that they dislike the primary curriculum work.

The other factor affecting the students is the arrangement whereby education is set apart from the practical issues of either work at their own level or with children. Surely it is obvious that the theories concerned with the creative process belong in the creative arts studios, and the person to talk about Getzells and Jackson is the "art" lecturer. Piaget belongs to a similar workshop setting—whether it happens to be an English lecturer explaining the necessity for young children to have concrete experience, or the environmental scientist illustrating with students and children theories related to children's ideas about horizontality.

The theories of education so earnestly presented by education lecturers, and written into education files by students, are a misuse of time. The lectures—however carefully presented—are usually unrelated to the child and the school. Students are requested to "see the link", or "observe certain patterns of behaviour".

But once they are in the hurly burly of 34 infants in a wooden hut on the outskirts of Wolverhampton, little or none of the information gathered permeates their teaching. The knowledge gained at lectures remains in a file earmarked "education" . . . "something we did at college", but removed from the legion of upper juniors struggling to do a play, make a life-sized monster or measure each other.

The answer is to design teacher training to fit the needs of children and school rather than the skills, interests, and expertise of college lecturers. Priority should be given to professional training. In order to implement this, two changes must occur.

First, the main subject is a luxury we cannot afford. Second, we cannot afford the amount of time given to education lectures. The theories, philosophies and ideas must of course be taught, but in a relevant and related manner—and the place to do this is in professional studies. Piaget, Skinner, Jung and Bernstein must be seen to be a part of real activity, and not names drifting in the void of a lecture room.

The answer is to replace most of the time given to education departments by subject based professional studies. De Bono should be encountered as a part of a science project. Lowenfeld belongs to the process of building a model with 25 noisy juniors, and Jennifer's inability to read belongs just at much to her inability to balance in Physical Education or draw using a base line, as it does to the lecture about Joyce Morris's Kent report.

Miss Average is beginning teaching at Midway primary school in September. She will be taking seven-year-olds, and as a BEd graduate is well qualified. Her main subject was history and she is very knowledgeable about the Middle Ages. Her dissertation "An Age of Faith" helped gain her an upper second class degree . . . and she enjoyed the main subject very much. She knows quite a lot about teaching children to read (though obviously there was not quite the same emphasis upon this as the Middle Ages).

Her mathematics is not too bad, but there was not time to really get into it. Art is a bit of a problem—but the children will only be using crayons, paint, paper, etc, for about 60 per cent of the day, so wit hhelp from the monthly art and craft magazine she will probably get by. She could not do any science because the college runs an "option scheme" (after all, in three years there is not time to encounter every area of the primary curriculum), but she has swapped some useful notes about magnets and things with another girl who hoped to do science rather than environmental studies.

The children of Midway Infants' are going to enjoy Miss Average, and her depth of understanding about history is going to enliven their day . . . and when she goes home in the evening to read through those education notes yet again, then tomorrow will be even more exciting.

What a tangle colleges have made of what should be a straightforward, relevant and enjoyable teacher training/education course. We know essentially what a primary school teacher needs to be. For the sake of our children and frustrated parents, let us learn to use the time properly. Let us prune the irrelevancies, and offer a course at a degree level in which the concerns and needs of the child and not the lecturer are central.

Alice's Adventures in Educationland

By Ian Lewis

With illustrations by Mike Brownfield

Alice was beginning to get very tired of her teacher training course, and of having no teaching to do; once or twice she had peeped into books on education, but they had nothing about schools or children in them, "and what is the use of a book about education", thought Alice, "without a mention of schools?"

So she was considering, in her own mind (as well as she could, for the boring lecture on developmental theory made her feel very sleepy and stupid) whether the chances of getting a job would be worth all the trouble of writing all those applications, when suddenly a rabbit with pink eyes ran close to her.

There was nothing so very remarkable in that; nor did Alice think it so very much out of the way to hear the rabbit say to itself: "Oh, dear! Oh, dear! Another insignificant correlation!"; but when the Rabbit took a calculator out of its waistcoat-pocket, and looked at it, and then hurried on, Alice started to her feet. It flashed across her mind that she had never before seen a rabbit with either a waistcoat pocket, or a calculator to take out of it. Burning with curiosity she saw it pop down a large rabbit hole and, in another moment, down she went after it.

The tunnel dipped so suddenly that Alice found herself falling down what seemed to be a very deep well. When she looked at the sides of the wall she noticed they were filled with green and white papers, population projections, reorganization schemes all thrown into disorganized heaps, and covered in dust. She took a jar from one shelf as she passed; it was labelled "FUTURE PLANS", but to her great disappointment it was empty.

Suddenly, thump! thump! down she came on a heap of dry leaves. Alice was not a bit hurt. Before her was another passage and the Rabbit was still in sight. Away Alice went like the wind, and was just in time to hear it say: "Oh my falling birthrate, how late it's getting!" She was close behind it when she turned the corner, but the Rabbit was no longer in sight. She found herself in a long, low hall.

There were doors all round the hall, but they were all locked and Alice wondered how she would ever get out. Looking around she saw a table with a bottle on it labelled: "Classroom Interaction: Drink me". Alice looked carefully at the bottle to make sure it wasn't marked "poison". As it was not so marked, she tried it, found it very nice and very soon finished it.

"What a curious feeling!" said Alice. She found she was only ten cms high, and she thought how easy it would now be to get into classrooms without being noticed. Unfortunately, there were no classrooms there, so Alice looked around further and eventually found a little glass box labelled: "Traditional Sociology: Eat Me". "Well, I'll try it", said Alice, and as she did so she noticed that she had grown so tall that she could no longer see her feet. Now I can look over the whole system of education, she thought, and see how it works.

However, in her new state she felt rather uncomfortable and began to cry, until there was a large pool around her, covering her feet, and stretching down the hall.

After a time she saw the White Rabbit returning, splendidly dressed with a pair of white paper gloves in one hand and a large hot air fan in the other, muttering to himself as he came: "Oh! the DES, the DES! Oh! won't she be savage if I've kept her waiting!" Alice said: "If you please, sir—", and the Rabbit started, dropped the gloves and fan, and ran off.

Alice took up the gloves and cooled herself with the fan. "Dear, dear! How queer everything is today! Let's see if I can remember anything from my training course." Her voice sounded strange:

"How doth the little schoolmaster
Reward the middle class
And make the best work faster
So all exams they pass!
How cheerfully he seems to grin
As working class kids fail
He welcomes all the goodies in
The rest—beyond the pale."

"I'm sure that can't be right", Alice, and her eyes filled with again. As she spoke, she noticed th had put one of the Rabbit's gloves must be growing small again' dropped the fan in surprise, and that she stopped shrinking. She one door and slipped, and found up to her neck in salt water.

---

"I wish I hadn't cried so much!" Alice, and just then, she saw a splashing about near her.

"O mouse, do you know if this Pool of Wasted Ability? I don't wa stay here." "Let's get to the sh said the Mouse, "this pool is getting overcrowded". Alice noticed that ind the pool was full of all sorts of shape sizes of people.

"Come on! Let's DoPool out said Alice, and led the way to the

"Now, let's get dry", said Alice, as whole dripping party stood miserab the beach.

"The best thing to get us dry w be a Free-school Race," said an Ido whom Alice had just noticed.

"What is a Free-School Race?" Alice. "Why," said the Dodo, "the way to explain it is to do it". At everyone started to run when they stopped when they liked and went they liked. When everybody had Alice asked: "Well! Who has won?"

"Everybody has won", said the ist, "and all must have prizes".

Luckily, Alice found she had a sweets in her pocket, and there exactly enough for everybody to one.

"You promised to tell me your Alice reminded the Mouse.

"It is a long and sad tale", it and began:

"But school shouldn't be like tha said Alice, "It should be liberating. shouldn't be marked for life". At that whole crowd set up a great noise, Alice clapped her hands to her head ran off.

She saw the Rabbit again, lo anxiously about him and mutter himself: "The DES! the DES! I'll executed, sure as IQ's are IQ's! can I have dropped them?" But Alice could give the gloves and fa him, he had run off again!

"How tiresome these researchers ar said Alice. "No, that's not right! I a rabbit! How queer everything is." she th they are very much alike, but never Always asking questions, but never things. And always dashing off the right people or about the they get a useful answer.

Alice was tired of all this running so she sat down. "I suppose I ou try to understand it all; but the qu is, 'What?'"

'I thought everyone had a right to determine the future of education', said Alice. 'Nonsense' said the NUT and LEA simultaneously.

"Who are you?", said a voice from behind her. She looked up and saw a Caterpillar sitting on a mushroom. It was a large caterpillar, with a red face, balding, but with large side-whiskers, reading a black paper.

"I don't know, sir", said Alice, a little disconcerted. "I keep changing, or things keep changing. Everytime I think I understand how the education system works it becomes different."

"What do you mean by that?", asked the Caterpillar, sternly. "Explain yourself".

"I can't explain myself, sir, let alone the system," said Alice.

"It's all perfectly plain to me", said the Caterpillar. "You just have to realize that only some people like me can pass through the system and become a butterfly. That's what the system's for; deciding who are to become the butterflies".

"I'm sure that can't be right" said Alice, "but I can't seem to remember anything properly at the moment".

"Repeat: 'You are old, dear Rhodes Boyson'," said the Caterpillar.

Alice began:

"You are old, dear Rhodes Boyson", the young man said;
"And your whiskers have grown very white",
Yet you say that selection is the way ahead—
Don't you think that your views are far right?
"In my youth", then Rhodes Boyson replied to the lad,
"I worked hard to pass all my tests;
And since my results were not all that bad,
Why, I think it should do for the rest."
"You are old", said the boy, "as I mentioned before,
And your party would not all agree.
Could you turn a back-somersault if you come to the fore;
Pray what would your policy be?"
"In my youth", said the sage as his finger he waved,
"I kept all my options wide open.
Which allows me to appear to be well-behaved.
I'm sure that in office I'd cope then."
"You are old", said the youth, "one would hardly, I think,
See your views as other than sinister.
Yet you balance, with St John, right over the brink.
Which of you two will be the next minister?"
"I have answered your questions, and that is enough"
Said the man. "Won't you please go away!
Do you think I can listen all the time to such stuff?
This is far worse than old Robin Day!"

"That's not right", said the Caterpillar.

"I thought it was far right", said Alice.

"In that case", said the Caterpillar, "it's time that you left". "But if I did then you'd be left", said Alice, "and I don't think you'd like that, would you?"

"If you're going to be like that", said the Caterpillar, "I'll take my select company elsewhere". And he moved away.

Alice walked on, and eventually came to a large, multi-storey block. As she stood looking at it, a footman dashed in through the doors, carrying a large envelope. "For the DES", he said, "An invitation", and handed the envelope to another footman inside.

Alice knocked. "It's no good knocking", said the footman, "Nobody ever listens in here. They're so wrapped up in the plans and forecasts that they can't be concerned about what's happening in the real world outside. You might as well come in".

As Alice went through the door, thousands of rolls fell with an enormous crash from some upper floor. "That's the latest problem", said the footman. "Falling rolls. They're dropping all the time and nobody seems to know what to do."

"Well! What am I to do?" asked Alice, dodging another pile of rolls.

"It doesn't matter what you do, so long as every day starts with an act of worship and there's RE on the curriculum", answered the footman with a yawn.

Alice walked through a door and there, in the middle of the room, was the DES, nursing a baby. Behind her stood a cook stirring a large couldron, labelled APU.

"It should be soup", said the DES, and sneezed. "It should be super, when we've got all the ingredients right and tested. Then we can stop all this local variation and get a really strong centralized structure in operation".

The Secretary turned crimson with fury and screamed: 'Close her down! Close her down!'

Alice looked at the baby. It had a sash around its body which said, NEW EDUCATION. "I hope it grows up better than the last one", she said. "Oh, it will", said the DES, "when all its food comes out of that cauldron. No more free choice! No more education on demand! No more relevance in this curriculum!"

As she said these words Alice noticed, for the first time, the cat which sat by the DES feet, and which grinned widely at every one of these statements.

"Why does your cat grin so?", asked Alice, politely. "Because it's an HMI cat, of course", said the DES.

"I didn't know that HMI cats always grinned", said Alice.

"They all can", said the DES, "and most of them do when they see what we're cooking".

With that she began singing a sort of lullaby to the baby.

"Speak roughly to the l.e.a.s,
Keep hitting them with squeezes,
They'll soon find that it really pays,
When teachers it displeases."

Alice ran out of the room, thinking they were all mad, and found herself outside the building again. Looking up, she saw the HMI cat on a lamp post, still grinning. It looks good-natured, thought Alice, but it does have very long claws, and fierce—looking teeth. I must try to be polite.

"Could you tell me how the education system ought to go, please?"

"That depends where you want it to go", said the cat, who had obviously studied the philosophy of curriculum design.

"I don't much care where", said Alice.

"Then it doesn't matter", said the cat.

"—— so long as it gets somewhere", Alice added.

"Oh, it's sure to do that", said the cat. "if it goes on long enough."

"But it goes on for eleven years now!" said Alice. "Anyway, which ways can it go?"

"In that direction", said the cat, "lives an LEA, and in that direction lives an NUT. Visit either if you like, they're both mad. Or you could go to the Schools Council. That's over there."

"But I don't think mad people will help", said Alice.

"Oh, you can't help that", said the cat, "we're all mad here, you know." With that the cat vanished.

He must be mad, thought Alice. With that, the cat returned.

"What became of the NEW EDUCATION baby?" he asked.

"I think it vanished", Alice replied.

"Just as well", said the cat, and vanished again.

I wish those HMI cats wouldn't keep popping in and out like that, thought Alice. It really is most disconcerting, and how can they ever find out what's going on anywhere if they just simply vanish and appear as they feel like it.

As she walked on she came to a large imposing building. I suppose this must be the Schools Council, she thought.

She could see a table set for tea, and both the NUT and the LEA were sitting there. Between them was a TAYLOR, fast asleep, and the other two were using it to rest their elbows upon.

Very uncomfortable to be kept down like that, thought Alice, but perhaps it doesn't want to be free.

"No room! No room!" they cried as they saw Alice come into the garden.

"But there's plenty of room", said Alice. "Anyway, I thought everyone had a right to determine the future of education".

"Nonsense", said the NUT and the LEA simultaneously. "We're the only people who know anything about it".

"Have some alphabet cake, you'll find it makes life very much simpler after you've eaten it".

"How does it do that?" asked Alice.

"Well", said the LEA, "if you get a piece with O or A or CSE in it you throw it away, and keep throwing them away until you get an N and F piece".

"But what if I like the O and A pieces and don't like the N and F?"

"That's too bad", they answered. "You don't think we've invented this so that you'll like it, do you? It's whether we like it that counts."

At this point the TAYLOR woke up and said: "But you must change the governing body!" and went to sleep again.

"What does he mean?", asked Alice.

"Oh, that's just his daft idea to try to stop us having our own way in how schools are run. He thinks that if you have parents and such-like helping to govern schools, and deciding their own budgets, and not letting us pack the governing bodies with our own representatives, we'll get a better system of education", the NUT replied.

"But that's a good idea", said Alice.

"It can't be a good idea", said the LEA.

"Why not?", she asked.

"Because we don't approve", they said and laughed.

"But you can't mean that", said Alice.

"Oh yes, we can, because we are mean, and we don't mean to give up anything we control. If you get our meaning", they replied.

"The TAYLOR is asleep", the NUT said, and poured a little scorn on his arguments.

The TAYLOR shook its head and said; "No, you misinterpret me, and make things far more complicated than they would be".

"Oh, I give up", said Alice and started to walk away. As she did so she noticed the NUT and the LEA changing places around the table. That's all that happens, she thought. They are the only ones there and all they do is change seats. Nothing else changes, except when they throw out another mad idea. I shan't go there again. It's quite clear they can't really help anyone to understand the education system at all.

Looking over her shoulder, she saw them stuff the TAYLOR in a wastepaper basket. As they did so she heard them shout triumphantly: "That's the last we'll hear of him. And good riddance. Now there's no one to interfere with us." And they broke into song:

"Twinkle, twinkle, working paper!
How I wonder if it's vapour
That you leave as you fly by,
Or merely hot air in the sky?"

I am glad I have left there, Alice thought, and found she had wandered into a garden full of little schools growing on trees. Gardeners were wandering around with pots of paint changing the labels on each one. Alice thought this was very curious, and went closer to see what they were doing.

"Why are you repainting those labels?" Alice asked the nearest gardener timidly.

"Why, you see, Miss, it's the great reorganization plan. The secretary had ordered a whole garden full of comprehensive trees and when they came up we found that they were all grammar and secondary trees and so we're going around repainting them to show that they are all really comprehensives."

"But they're still the same trees", said Alice. "Won't someone notice?"

"Oh, no, Miss, that's all right. They only look at the labels. They could be prisons or hospitals really. It all depends on what it says on the label. Nobody really looks inside them to find out what's going on."

Just then, one of the other gardeners shouted: "Look out, it's the secretary, she's coming!"

And Alice saw the gardeners all fling themselves to the ground.

She looked round and saw the Secretary, flanked by under-secretaries, private secretaries and other very civil servants, all passing memos to each other as they walked. Alice was doubtful about what she should do. She had never met a Secretary before. But she thought there was no point in lying down like the gardeners. What is the use of a Secretary, she thought, if no one can see her or talk to her?

"Who are you?" asked the Secretary.

"Alice, if you please. And I'm trying to find out about education."

"What's that?" asked the Secretary and looked around.

"But you must know", said Alice, "its your business."

The Secretary turned crimson with fury and screamed: "Close her down! Close her down!"

"I'm afraid you can't do that, she's not a college, Secretary", said one of the retinue.

"Why can't I?" said the Secretary. "If I want to close a thing down I will. So there"

At that moment another pile of rolls fell in the corner of the garden.

"If those rolls keep dropping", the Secretary said, "I'll close them all down. And what will you lot do then? Sometimes I think the whole purpose of schools is simply to keep teachers, advisers, l.e.a.s, HMIs and civil servants employed. It's not really got anything to do with children at all. I'm not even sure if children wouldn't benefit if we closed them all down. What do you say to that?" the Secretary asked Alice.

"Well I only came here to find out", said Alice. "How am I supposed to know the answers?"

"All I can tell you", she continued, "is that no one else I've seen in the system seems to know any better than I do, so perhaps you could scrub it all and start again." As she spoke, there was a great peal of thunder, and thousands upon thousands of rolls fell in a continuous stream and knocked everybody down, flinging them all around. Alice gave a little scream and started to wave her hands about to try to protect herself. As she did so she found that she wasn't in the garden at all, but back on the bench in the lecture room. The banging was the seats being raised as everyone else was getting up and leaving the room.

"I've had such a strange dream", Alice said to the student sitting next to her. "I dreamt that nobody really understood the education system at all."

"Perhaps they've all had the same training, then", said the student. "You'd certainly not learn anything useful if you come on this course!"

Aspekte, inspect, prospec

Salzburg, home of Mozart and "The Sound of Music", is fast becoming an important centre for new music. Robin Maconie, just back from Aspekte, the city's festival of new music, reports on what went on and looks to the future

Salzburg, home of Mozart and assembly point for devotees of Herbert von Karajan, is not the first place one thinks of in connexion with active promotion of contemporary music. Indeed, the traditionally conservative European Burgerschaft is epitomised by a town synonymous with the Salzburg Festival and The Sound of Music, a place where Mozart means both music and a milk-chocolate gobstopper. In such an atmosphere of cultural consumerism it is especially gratifying to discover Aspekte, a modestly-named festival of new music, alive and flourishing. If Salzburg can do it, there is hope for all of us.

By new music, of course, one means "involved" — engagierte Musik. Not the twentieth-century pabulum from Poulenc to Hindemith, which even students at the Mozarteum music academy are grudgingly advised to take as a disagreeable specific against too indulgent a musical diet, but the musical stimulus of new discovery. Involved music makes both player and listener think; and there are unmistakable signs that a few people in Salzburg do want to think for themselves.

Not least among them are the Salzburg music critics, reacting to a man against the production-line tedium of a constantly-recycled classical repertoire. Like any other news, music is affected by the law of diminishing returns, and though there are many in and around the music profession for whom the world of ideas has long since shrunk beyond vanishing point, Salzburg is fortunate in possessing a proportionately large and active body of music journalists alive to the immediate stimulus of new music and its leavening influence on community culture as a whole.

Aspekte is also in luck in its relations with the local ORF radio and television station, a new, small organization whose involvement in broadcasting and documentation of the festival's activities has been an essential element in its success. It has been invaluable both in the short term, as a means of keeping a sleepy public constantly informed during the course of events, and also—and perhaps more important—as a means of ensuring the permanent documentation for future generations of matters whose cultural and historical importance may only much later be fully appreciated.

The significance of occasions such as Aspekte extends further than one would think. Not the least of the organizers' problems is that of having to persuade those of their colleagues within the music profession who have a say in the granting of funds, that this is so. There is enough of a challenge in preparing and rehearsing difficult new works for a public without also having to cope with the exhaustingly banal objections of musical petty officers whose concept of musical value is expressed in box-office takings and numbers of seats occupied. Because tomorrow those seats will be empty. What matters are people's minds, and the potency of ideas.

The festival programme began at Petersbrunnhof, a Salzburg equivalent to London's Round House (though originally designed for horses and hay, not trains) in architectural charm and, less advantageously, acoustics. Wolfgang Güttler, contrabassist with the Berlin Philharmonic, presented a solo concert of enormous vitality. Of late there has been a welcome expansion of the solo repertoire for traditionally neglected instruments like the contrabass, trombone and tuba, and for instruments of this size it is only natural that an element of cabaret should begin to emerge. And why not? Children love it, and the music itself attaches to the tradition of Pierrot and Dada.

In Contrasignatur, by Wilfried Michel, the solo steers a course between two not-quite-parallel pre-recorded alternatives, something like split-screen technique in film in which three different views of the same event are given simultaneously. Excitement was well sustained by the musical action and careful rhythmic and tonal signposting. Klaus Ager, organizing dynamo of Aspekte, and Andrzej Dobrowolski, a senior member of the Polish avant-garde, were each represented by works for contrabass and tape in which the familiar opposition of live and electronic music is acted out as an almost medieval morality of Everyman and the devil, or Jacob wrestling with the angel.

Unlike our Barry Guy, whose excursions on double bass as composer or performer are marked by aggressive virtuosity, Herr Güttler—as befits a Karajan-trained musician—plays his solo roles with a cool, almost philosophical distraction, a Pierrot character in Alexandre Hrisanide's delicately hallucinatory La Ou Ca Passe, a Svengali (treating the bass as sex-object) in dzor by Hans Joachim Hespos, and actually donning a frac and white face make-up for Hubert Stuppner's Rondo for a Clown, a Tantalus vision of the artist always chasing a perfect technique, represented on tape by whirling, high-speed figurations.

Exvoco, a vocal trio and technician who have visited Britain as members of Clytus Gottwald's Schola Cantorum of Stuttgart, appeared later the same evening in an amazing Poetry and Music Spectacular which succeeded in doing for the ear what the recent Dada-Surrealism exhibition at the Hayward Gallery did for the eye. Concrete verse by Marinetti, Artaud, Arp, Tzara, Hugo Ball, van Doesburg, Hülsenbeck and Schwitters from the Dada heyday alternated with more recent typographic and verbal fancies by Max Bense, Gerhard Rühm, Maurice Lemaitre, Franz Mon, Arrigo Lora-Totino, and composers Berio, Schnebel and Cage.

Each text was projected on to screens, up to three simultaneously, and interpreted in sound with scrupulous care and enormous verve, no two sounding the same. Those who might have thought concrete verse to be a merely typographical diversion, poetry for the eye only, should experience the Milliganesque fantasy of Artaud's "Totem Etranglé", the Satie-like "furniture poetry" of Ball's "Gadji beri bimba", Gomringer's "Worte sind Schatten" (Words are shadows) dizzyingly realized with tape delay and ring modulation, or the same poet's amiable Dalek reiteration (with travelling printer's error) of "Kein Fehler im System" (No fault in the system).

Like so much of Aspekte, this was a child's garden of vocal delights, a virtually unknown field of artistic expression which could revolutionize radio and TV advertising if only the agencies got to hear about it. Somebody should bring Exvoco to Britain, and soon, while the Dada exhibition is still fresh in people's minds.

A young French group, the Travelling Electronic Band (Ensemble d'Instruments Electroniques de l'Itinéraire) the following evening presented a concert of live electro-acoustic music which brought vividly into relief the historical, one might even say academic, tradition apparent in France in this still comparatively new field.

From the time of early Paris experiments in tape manipulated sound (also the time of Cage's prepared piano and the percussion sculptures of Lasry-Baschet) French experimental music has been dominated, so it seems, by a love of elegant, polished reverberations of a mainly metallic character. All four works, by Michel Zbar, Yoshihisa Taira, François Bousch and Tristan Murail, shared a common preoccupation with refinements of timbre: scintillating sound constantly in vibration though little movement, disdaining texture contrast or overt drama. This is interesting as a collective phenomenon, even if it may be difficult for a non-Frenchised listener to grasp in individual pieces; and it would not be difficult to imagine this music appealing considerably, if it were more widely known, to aficionados of electronic late sixties rock, choreographers, and theatrical producers with a soft spot for Ibsen. Hearing two Ondes Martenot at once is also an experience to remember.

If the French are all hauteur and couture, the Greeks, to judge by a little concert-symposium entitled "The Way to Monodrama", are all passion. Baritone Spyros Sakkas, accompanied by pianist and occasional vocalist Georg Kouroupos, began rather severely, I thought, with a dead-pan Salvum me fac by Wilhelm Killmayer in Middle Eastern idiom that began to sound after a while like a vocal reduction of Ravel's Bolero. The piano is not the best accompaniment for imitation religion, unfortunately, so when it came to Theodor Antoniou's Chorochronos III, in which, we are advised, the soloist playing the role of a night priest "not only sings and speaks, but also improvises with the public", the audience joined in with enthusiasm.

But it took Gerard Geay's settings of Benjamin Tucholsky's Lerne lachen ohne weinen, the Georg Grosz of literature, that the Greek flair for drama and humour really began to emerge. This was splendid satire, enough to put Monty Python in the shade: somebody should commission a translation for John Cleese straight away. Kouroupos' own Red Scarf, another little piece particularly apt for children, enabled the short pianist-composer to stage a fight with his overweening colleague, in which the red scarf is used alternately to bind or obstruct one, then the other player, and finally win. Having thrown the red scarf round his neck in a gesture worthy of Nureyev, the singer finds himself stealthily and neatly garotted.

Quite a large proportion of Aspekte was given over to discussion and performance of music for computer. Jean-Claude Risset, the soft-spoken American-trained director of the computer music section of IRCAM, set the scene with a concise introduction to the present state of research. Computer music is a specialized field, and one can easily form an impression that those directly involved spend more time conferring with one another than composing. Still, there was much to whet the appetite in what he said and demonstrated by taped example.

A great deal of research hitherto has gone into transferring certain fundamental principles of electronic and concrete music into computerese, so it is possible to determine even at a comparatively early stage of development that this music does belong to a coherent aesthetic and tradition. As with the electro-acoustic band from Paris, some distinctly French elements predominate, notably a love of precise, keyboard-based metallic timbres. Indeed, just like Switched-on Bach, the latent affinity of computer music with eighteenth-century music tends to surface spontaneously in such studies as a remarkable re-creation of a Corelli organ sonata, and a predisposition toward harpsichord-type timbres and figurations.

Again, there has been a noticeable lack of physical rhetoric in much computer music in the past, as a result of a fairly narrow concentration on the immediate problem of basic notational values. However, as Risset remarked, we are now on the threshold of great advances in the realm of microprocessing and consequently much wider dissemination of expertise: in a few years computer music will no longer need to remain the preserve of a few wealthy institutions but will be cheaply available to all. Then, perhaps, we shall begin to see a hitherto monolithic structure begin to sort itself out into more clearly-defined subject areas, among them analysis, sound projection and psycho-acoustic research. Perhaps, too, rapid development in computer hardware has forced research into a pattern of con updating of programmes, may at last down and allow researchers a chance to municate more freely with the world commercial recording and live electronic which many interesting advances have been made.

Certainly the music presented in two certs did show clear signs, not of the ium's inherent limitations as much as effects of the disproportionate energy hit to exacted from composers in the simple paration of basic software—the programs themselves. As with intuitive music, which musical meditation, these computer pieces David Wessel, Loren Rush, Wesley Fu John Chowning, Hans Knall, Tamas Ung and Risset himself tend to communicate first an exclamatory trial-by-fire experie which can be disturbing, if the listener unprepared. However, after a certain time if by a sort of divine intervention, the m can suddenly click, and the listener awak to a calm apprehension of sounds, often qu simple in themselves, which act on the in extraordinary ways.

One way of making this music speak m readily to the untutored listener would c tainly be to take it out of the confined spa —here the recording studio of ORF — which it is usually presented, into wid open spaces more suited to its scale of g ture and dramatic quality. Salzburg is in such spaces, needless to say, and o would like to think that next year Aspekte may persuade the city fathers to allow both the funds and the opportunity for pub manifestations, for instance at the fam natural Steintheater hollowed out of rock in the forest by Schloss Hellbrunn, across the lake by the equally impos Schloss Leopoldskron.

A particularly intriguing sample of h monic experimentation from earlier was to be heard in part of a concert devo to piano works of music using quarter-to composed by Ivan Wyschnegradsky, the year-old Russian-born composer and erstwhi colleague of Alois Haba whose single-mind devotion to refractions of equal temperame is due for reappraisal after years of negle A selection of early préludes, Opus 22, pla on two pianos tuned a quartertone apa evoked an uncanny recollection of thi cabaret, by turns wistful, nostalgic and hin menacing. Integrations, a later work for the same combination, impressed by its pha command of what can only be described sculptural forms: a sense of tonal space of perspective, full of subtle effects of dep and parallax.

Fittingly, the final concert of an extre ingly rich series was given over to works two young Salzburg composers, Aspekte's principal organizer Klaus Ager, and his c league at the Mozarteum Andor Losoncz reduced version of Ager's monumental —Break towards Infinity, for 24 voices a associated hand percussion and tam-ta proved meditative in character and distinct rococo in aural design: a slowly undulati vocal background with a rich and sparkli surface decoration of small percussion det More Grimmly fairytale in conception was esta la muerte? for five players and tape which enacted once again that confrontation of man and unknown spirit which seems appeal so intensely to the middle-Europe temperament. A mysterious, insistent cric like chirping on tape gradually approach reducing the musicians onstage to first vousness, then panic, and finally shrill desperate attempts to placate the unse menace by offerings of snatches of melo from the past.

Where Ager's music appears essentiall reactive, Losonsky's Growth Structures a Black Box are much more expressions physical gesture, like dynamic calligraphy He certainly works his performers hard, b the intensity of conception grips the hear and Black Box, for large instrumental ensemble and choir, the choir separated in adjacent room, positively seethed bubbled, a potent antiphony of the forces of nature and those redeeming fo ses of the spirit, which had a tiny girl front of me jumping up and down w delight. This was a brave and uncompro conclusion to a brave and long festival. Bravo Aspekte, and long ma continue.

O levels or football?

Sixth forms are dwindling and most technical and FE colleges are reaping a meagre harvest. Sixth form colleges, in contrast, seem to be flourishing. Harry Rée reviews a recent study of the phenomenon

Sixth-Form Colleges. By Eric Macfarlane.
Heinemann Educational £5.95. 435 80780 3.

The 16 to 19 debate has begun and an auction is on. Of the various agencies competing to educate this age group, the sixth form college, as far as growth rates are concerned, is well out in front. There were 12 colleges in 1970; by 1977 there were 79. Running them close in the numbers game, but not in new ideas, are the technical and FE colleges. The other main competitor, the school sixth form, is limping along behind, except of course in the prestige independent schools where the old exclusive model is still attracting buyers.

The comprehensive schools, in the past 10 years or so, besides coping with small numbers of A level candidates, have made a great effort to prepare a place for the New Sixth, for those who are unwilling or unable to tackle the academic demands of A level. For them, new courses have been offered, new exams invented, common rooms have been equipped, regulations relaxed, privileges increased and duties removed. But in spite of these blandishments they don't seem to have been popular. The students feel that they are in, but not of, the school, while staff who teach them often feel unable to concentrate attention on them to the extent they ought, because of the pressing demands made by much larger and more difficult classes in the middle school. And now falling rolls have forced some schools to take defensive action by combining with neighbour sixths, but for many the knell has tolled, and the teachers know it.

The technical and FE colleges have gained students from school fifth forms, but these institutions are handicapped also by the demands made on them by their normal clients, and only a few, like Nelson and Colne, have gone out of their way to adapt their teaching and atmosphere to the needs of these newcomers.

Into this partial vacuum, where sixth forms are dwindling and most established colleges are offering uncertain benefits, has leapt the brand new, experimental, enthusiastic sixth form college. Can it fail to take off? Eric Macfarlane clearly thinks it can't, and in his book he explains why.

The start, he admits, was not a flying one. In the early years the idea of the sixth form college met a lot of opposition. Macfarlane reminds us of the details of the still-born Croydon scheme, glances a bit condescendingly at Mexborough's appendix college (attached to the existing grammar school) and was far from happy about the first purpose-built detached college at Luton ("It got off to a false start", says Macfarlane) because the entry fee was four O levels. For he is totally opposed to the selective college; the open access school must be followed by the open access college.

The problem, of course, is not only that the college must offer a huge variety of options, but these must be suited to students ranging from alpha to omega. The college, as approved by Macfarlane, has no inhibitions, such as are felt by schools, in offering some courses which lead to prestige careers with salaries attached, and others which lead to craft or service jobs which earn wages. He gives a telling gloss to this doctrine when he insists that the presence of a student like Barry, with a reading age of 11, or of Avril, a moody girl with one O level, is of the greatest importance to the whole college. "They are to the comprehensive college what the Oxbridge group was to the traditional grammar school, a symbol of the values for which the institution stands."

Although he gives examples of good practice from a number of flourishing colleges, the model of Queen Mary's College, Basingstoke, where Macfarlane has been principal since it opened six years ago, is never far from the pages of this book. Macfarlane is therefore easily able to show what successes can be marked up when an enthusiastic staff are brought together with a wide variety of volunteer students under a highly motivated and energetic boss.

It might be said that the book is over long. Besides dealing fully with the curriculum, and in particular with the place of unexamined general studies, he goes into details of management, administration, design and architecture which will be useful to only a limited number of readers. But his habit of illustrating points by case histories adds humanity and liveliness. We are introduced in the first chapter to 10 students as they apply to enter the college and they consider possible options; half way through the book we meet them again, when they have embarked on their courses; finally in the appendix we say goodbye to them as "finished products".

Staff, too, are seen through three case studies after a number of shrewd points have been made about the qualities required from staff in a sixth form college. He warns of the refugee from middle school disrupters, and of the committed academic looking for a quiet life in which to get on with research. On the other hand he welcomes those who have done jobs other than teaching, and goes further; he suggests that in-service training might usefully be spent, not in studying education, but in doing a quite different job from teaching; surely this suggestion could be extended to teachers in schools.

Of general interest also is the problem of the individual and community, to which a whole chapter is devoted. Here Macfarlane emphasises the sense of responsibility students are required to exercise, because the burden of choice is laid on them from the very beginning. A boy illustrates this: "I was asked at interview if I intended to take an O level course or play football. That surprised me. I realized it was going to be different to school."

But critics might argue that it is an egocentric sense of responsibility that is inculcated, while the chance to serve or be involved in the wider society is missing. Such criticism is not confined to those who look back nostalgically to an obsolescent prefect system. The opportunity seems to be missing to work with and alongside people of all ages such as is offered in tertiary colleges. Macfarlane hardly deals with this, contenting himself with pointing to the numerous extra curricular activities undertaken by students, and to the college-run groups which give scope for committeework and administration.

This is hardly enough, and although a good sixth form college emerges from this book as a very satisfactory solution for local authorities still reorganizing, it may not be able to provide so good and wide an experience of the community as a college where there is a preponderance of older students, and where the New Sixth is seriously catered for. Nevertheless, this latest arrival on the educational scene should be given an enthusiastic welcome, as should this study.

Reading, writing and . . .

The Third R. Towards A Numerate Society. Edited by J. A. Glenn.
Harper and Row £3.95. 06 318075 8. £1.95. 06 318076 6.

Numeracy has had a good press recently. At least, attention to the matter has been quantitatively good, though most of the comments have been more than critical of the attainments of school leavers.

The National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education is one of many bodies anxious to see greatly improved standards of computational skill and understanding of numerical concepts. Towards this end the Mathematical Education section of the Association has prepared a discussion document based on contributions by a strong team including representatives of polytechnics and colleges of education.

Although the compilers and editor wished not to make their work "read like an instruction book for teaching arithmetic", and while they have concentrated on "attitudes and approaches rather than step-by-step procedures" it is inevitable that much of the writing is concerned with method and technique.

There is good sense in all the chapters, whether dealing with number bonds, the four rules, fractions and decimals, or educational objectives. As a generalization, however, there is little that is novel here, the bulk of the material being of the nature advocated in reports from the Mathematical Association, the Association of Teachers of Mathematics, or similar bodies.

But there is considerable significance in the fact that a group of educationists engaged in the tertiary stage should be concerned with school problems and should offer constructive suggestions towards their solution. Moreover, the discussion is conducted, not in any spirit of blame or complaint, but in an effort to identify the number-processes and concepts which are essential in an educated person's armoury, and to consider how the minimum understanding to satisfy normal social needs can be achieved.

The recent pilot test conducted by the Institute of Mathematics and its Applications involved some 8,000 pupils in six different local authorities chosen to provide a balance between urban and rural schools and between industrial, suburban and agricultural areas. The distressing results underline the need for action so well enunciated in The Third R.

"It may not be the function of schools to provide employers with a suitably trained labour force but surely we cannot accept that a normal five-year-old should spend the next 10 years of life in schools without being able to use words and numbers well enough to become an effective member of society. We need mathematicians, technologists, scientists (even if not in the rather academic form that schools and colleges are tending to produce them) so urgently that we must give every pupil the chance to find these studies rewarding and hence to continue with them. We also need many more of our citizens, who are not professionally concerned in mathematics or its application, to have a greater understanding of the characteristic ways of thinking that govern all quantitative studies."

So what should be taught? What is basic and essential? What is the motivation? What are the "behavioural objectives"?

There are expressive pointers towards possible answers to questions such as these in the classroom procedures so clearly set out in this book, and in the philosophical comments that precede, follow and indeed pervade the core of the book. The emphasis is on arithmetical skills rather than on an all-embracing mathematical education. The issues concern everyone involved in the upbringing of children.

This major study is designed to help heads, senior staff and expressive arts teachers work towards the development of an integrated arts curriculum. In Part I Malcolm Ross discusses the creative process, the teacher-pupil relationship and the aims of arts teaching. Part II exemplifies many of these ideas through the experiences of six practising teachers working in the fields of art, music, dance and drama. There is also a chapter on examinations and the appendices provide examples of imaginative possibilities in examining dance and drama; there is also a detailed suggestion for a music curriculum.

As she is spoke

David Self

English Dialects (Revised edition). By Martyn F. Wakelin.
University of London/Athlone Press £3.50. 485 12031 3.

The English have a continuing fascination with dialect. Even nowadays when tape-recording is so easy and so common, we love to see attempts to preserve in print all the richness of our varied oral traditions.

On the one hand there are the popular works like Scott Dobson's Larn Yersel' Geordie with its "why-ayes", "gannon kiddars" and "Hoo's it gannin' at th' match?"; and also the teach-yourself phrase books like Lern yerself Scouse with Fritz Spiegl's elegant translations of phrases like "Are ya gett'n up den, droopy drawers?" and its answer "No la, I'm tuk!" ("May I have the pleasure?" and "Forgive me but I have promised the next dance to another").

On the other hand there are the academic attempts to analyse our elided vowels and clipped consonants.

Martyn Wokolin's English Dialects falls into this latter categov. Its subject, too, is regional dialect or, more properly, linguistic geography; but Dr Wakelin's aim is to provide an academic introduction to this study for those with some background in linguistic studies.

He begins by filling in the salient events in the history of our language—the Anglo-Saxon invasion, the Scandinavian settlements, the Norman Conquest and the rise of Standard English, for example. Then follows a fascinating chapter on the history of dialect study: sixteenth and seventeenth-century schoolmasters seem to have waged a constant war against dialect spellings. The headmaster of the grammar school at Bury St Edmunds, Edmund Coote, emphasized in particular the dangers of "imitating the barbarous speech of your countrie people", warning his pupils not to put v for f in words like feale (ie veal).

He allows, however, that a Northerner may use local words in private correspondence. At the same time the High Master of St Paul's was waxing eloquent on the Great Vowel Shift, and an English teacher called Christopher Cooper was busy correcting such "vulgar" spelling as vitles (for victuals), ent (for is not) and git (for get).

If all this sounds remarkably familiar, Dr Wakelin moves on to more abstruse matters in the main part of his thesis, where he catalogues the occurrence of a selection of regional words (dialect) and pronunciations (accent). It is here that one begins to take issue with the author—not over his meticulous research but on its presentation. Granted, he is assuming "some knowledge of linguistic method" on the part of his readers, but his "general intention has been to introduce the study of dialect to those unfamiliar with it". This aim is not realized with sentences so congested with abbreviations and references they are as unreadable as a typical one describing the occurrence of "velar fricatives": "The rest of the country has the usual (f) except for (o) at K4, O3, Nf8, Ess9/13, (ft) at Nf13, Sf2, Bk2/4 (x) at Y30 and (xf) at La12."

Long paragraphs in this style do not make for easy reading and one can only wonder why greater use has not been made of maps and tables.

Equally frustrating are two short final chapters in which Dr Wakelin has stepped outside his self-imposed brief of considering only geographical dialect in order to glance at social and occupational dialects, both of which are of considerable interest.

As co-editor of the Survey of English Dialects, the writer was well placed to devise a dialectology primer and serious students will welcome this revised edition. It is not, however, by any stretch of the imagination a "popular" work.

Unmet Need. By Anthea Byles and Pauline Morris.
Routledge and Kegan Paul £2.95. 7100 8649 0.
Representation and Administrative Tribunals. By Anne Frost and Coral Howard.
Routledge and Kegan Paul £2.95. 7100 8701 2.
Partnership Law (11th edition). By P. W. D. Redmond.
Macdonald and Evans £1.50. 7121 1674 5.

Unmet Need is the report of research based upon the operations of the North Kensington Neighbourhood Law Centre: the material was gathered in 1973. It had been hoped that the research would also embrace new law centres—North Kensington was the first—but this proved impracticable. The unmet need is, of course, the need for legal help as a consequence of the problems which beset the poor because of their poverty. These are matters beyond the scope of the official legal aid system normally, and in any case, there are grounds for fearing that a sizeable proportion of lawyers was (is?) not adequately equipped to deal with them.

The study assesses the impact of the centre upon the whole local community, and its effectiveness. An illuminating account of the aim, establishment and operation of the centre is given. The research method employed is described, and the whole is adequately supported by statistical tables. The authors themselves realize that the study of one centre in isolation may be misleading: but if it accomplished nothing else, it would be invaluable in showing that the idea that a mere extension of the normal legal aid system would be sufficient, is much too cosy.

Representation and Administrative Tribunals reports research undertaken in 1971-74 into the operation of three "welfare" tribunals. Such bodies form an important part of the area in which the unmet need for legal services is most felt. The study contrasts the theory and practice of these bodies, contains enough statistics, and describes both the parties appearing before tribunals and the representation they have had. The authors emphasize the great importance of able representation—for it is recognized among the informed that the unrepresented citizen is at an extraordinary disadvantage; but they go farther and imply that to deal with that issue alone, is merely to attend to symptoms leaving untouched the real disease, deprivation "which is rooted in the economic system". Both volumes are both scholarly and serve to prick the social conscience.

Mr Redmond's task was more prosaic: he has revised the text of the well-known students' aid in the light of developments since the last edition was published in 1966.

Identikit educationist

Jenny Rogers

Structure and Performance in Adult Education. By Graham Mee and Harold Wiltshire.
Longman £2.95. 582 48944 X.

This is an identikit portrait: he is isolated, chronically overworked and his family life suffers. He moves about justifying his work to others but at the same time is sustained by his own vision of its importance and value. He feels helpless in the face of ridiculous and unworkable regulations, yet he constantly manages a commendable degree of innovation in his work.

Who is he? Only one figure in British education could possibly fit this description—the lone and embattled local authority adult educationist.

His situation is truly unique. His students must be actively recruited from scratch every year and their commitment to adult education is necessarily fragile. Because his work is regarded as "recreational" or "non-vocational"—both equally dismissive euphemisms for "a luxury"—his already slender budget is threatened in stringent economic times.

This new book by Grahem Mee and Harold Wiltshire at last provides hard evidence of support for such familiar generalizations. It is a book about the living texture of adult education in the mid-seventies. The authors have found, for instance, that there is an astonishing degree of unspoken national consensus which amounts to a "core curriculum". Craft, aesthetic and physical skill subjects account together for nearly 80 per cent of all the programmes analysed.

They confirm that adult educationists function more confidently and probably more satisfactorily when they have their own buildings, staff and professional l.e.a. support. One damning little sidelight on official indifference emerged early in this study: the authors note dryly that many l.e.a.s. were unable to provide even the simplest information on their own adult education programmes because they simply don't bother to collect it.

The authors established, too, how far concern with the "disadvantaged" has established a niche. Their interviews revealed one reason why—unlike flower-arranging or badminton—classes for non-readers or the deaf have turned out to be easy to defend in committees.

Perhaps "the disadvantaged" also make a more satisfying target group than that much greater challenge, the "middle mass of the population . . . with minimum education, low wages, young families, and no claim to special provision or concessionary fees". The authors' words of warning here are timely. When money and manpower are so limited, too much emphasis on "the disadvantaged" could be soft option, a diversion, however worthy, from the main task.

This book reveals the damage already done. When one authority after another proposed massive fee increases, there were many bland assurances that adult education was "underpriced" and that it might even be jolly good for it to be "self-supporting". On the evidence of this research, the result already looks catastrophic. Combined with other "economies" (larger classes, shorter terms) the authors reckon the net loss between 1975-77 could well be as big as one third.

Good research and good books in this field are so few. One longs for something readable enough to tempt politicians, tutors and organisers alike. This book has important, solid new evidence. It is authentic, sympathetic and hard-hitting, but it is frankly stodgy.

I would happily have been spared so much about sampling techniques or the "typology of organizations". These matters would surely have been better banished to an appendix and their detail discreetly shared between authors, the DES who financed them and other research workers. Far better to have expanded the fascinating interview material or to have developed the badly-listed "conclusions" chapter into a full-blown critique of the l.e.a. system. Perhaps that is another more self-indulgent book, still remaining to be written?

Life at the top

Gerald Haigh

Management and Headship in the Secondary School. Edited by Arnold Jennings.
Ward Lock Educational £7.00. 7062 3684 X. £3.50. 3664 5.

Democracy ebbs and flows; volcanic upthrusts of progressivism glint briefly in the distance; but the power and influence of the British head teacher remains largely unchanged. He still commonly speaks of "my school", "my staff", "my children"—even "my parents"—by which he does not, of course, mean his own mum and dad.

Of course, the actual detailed style of headship varies tremendously. Look around an interschool athletics meeting, for example. One headmaster will be in his shirt sleeves, wielding a tape measure at the long jump pit. Another will be sitting on a shooting stick in a tropical weight suit, speaking only to heads of schools the same size as his or bigger. The first head is likely to be found carrying chairs about his school or unblocking the lavatories. The second sits behind a polished desk, emerging only to walk the corridors followed by the caretaker with a notebook. For many, indeed, the ultimate aim may be to delegate to the point where there is nothing left to do but stroll around patting small boys on the head.

Arnold Jennings, in the introductory essay of this symposium, well recognises these differences of style, and can resist no more than I can the temptation to retail illustrative anecdotes. There was the head who spent a day mending the home economics department's washing machine, and the head whose office wall bore a notice saying, "Dr—does not normally see parents or children."

Jennings, too, is as sceptical as I am of the notion that the authority of the head has significantly changed from when Thring of Uppingham could say, "I am supreme here, and I brook no interference". Modern heads might not say it quite so baldly, but the thought is clearly there. The reason lies quite simply and inescapably in the relationship between responsibility and power. As Jennings puts it, ". . . a head is always held responsible for what other people in his school do, besides what he does himself." And so, "this is the role of the head, to carry the responsibility for the school and for all the decisions that are taken in it."

What has changed, the book reminds us, is the way that the head's authority is exercised. Words like "management" and "consultation" are heard much more often than they used to be, although there has been little attempt by our employers to help senior teachers find out what such words mean or the nature of the concepts behind them.

The 15 articles in this book range very widely over the task of headship. Alan Barnes, for example, writes on pastoral care; Gannon and Whalley discuss the management of the small school—a welcome antidote to the rest of the book's concentration on the large comprehensive. Joyce Bradbury writes about the particular needs of girls, Ron Bushell about remedial provision and so on.

All the contributions are readable. Some are of direct practical use: I liked Ron Mitson's article on resources, for example. Others are more discursive and philosophical. As an attempt to introduce the new or aspiring head to some of the issues he will have to face, the book is competent and authoritative.

The strongest opposition to it, of course, is likely to come from those who question the prescriptive and authoritarian position of the head. Undoubtedly there will be some of our profession who will see these pages dimly, through a red mist of fury. For such colleagues, this book is a reminder of the reality of school life. The head of a big comprehensive school is not, after all, being paid eight or nine thousand a year for the privilege of being outvoted by his junior members of staff.

A Cage of Shadows. By Archie Hill.
Hutchinson £3.95. 09 129390 1.

Archie Hill's account of his childhood in the Black Country during the depressed thirties was first published four years ago, and was speedily withdrawn because of various passages which his mother considered to be libellous. These have now been taken out, and this important book is at last generally available.

It goes beyond the sensitive reliving of a childhood to disentangle the tortuous ties that can entangle a father and son in a bad relationship for decades. Everything was stacked against Archie Hill. The family's extreme poverty was made harder to bear by his father's drunken violence, so it was small wonder that the son also sought an escape in drink. It was a path that led him to prisons, mental hospitals and finally to a London meths drinkers' coven.

Mr Hill only hints at the objective resources that enabled him to walk painfully away from all that to a happy marriage, a successful career as a writer, broadcaster and novelist, and to voluntary social work in which he can use his imagination and experience to help those who are still trying to emerge out of the shadows. An innate love of good music; the fortunate meeting during one of his stretches inside with a wise, political prisoner; and his own dogged courage and will-power all played a part in his rehabilitation, and his final reconciliation with his dying father.

This book is a tribute to an even stronger influence: the men of the Black Country (his father included) who in the midst of industrial degradation took him into the countryside poaching and snaring small birds in an attempt to fill their empty larders. It was on these excursions that the young Archie's senses were awakened; as his autobiography testifies, they remained alert through years of desperation that would have turned most men into machines.

The Development of Thought: Equilibration of Cognitive Structures. By Jean Piaget.
Blackwell £8.50. 0631 189 106.

Piaget's concept of equilibration is central to his theory of intellectual development. Other concepts within the theory take on their full meaning only by reference to this concept. This latest volume based on studies made at the International Centre of Genetic Epistemology in Geneva represents a culmination of Piaget's work, for in it his conception of equilibration is recast and more fully developed than in any of his previous writings.

Political Power: USA/USSR: Similarities and Contrasts; Convergence or Evolution. By Zbigniew Brzezinski and Samuel P. Huntington.
Penguin £2.25. 14 00 4373X.
Between Two Ages: America's Role in the Technetronic Era. By Zbigniew Brzezinski.
Penguin £1.60. 14 00 4313 4.

Academics play a relatively small part in policy formation and direction in Britain. The professional civil service has been most efficient in thwarting potential rival sources of expertise. In contrast, American rulers at national and state levels have frequently leaned heavily on their imported university academics for ideas and policy direction. Whereas certain journalists in Britain write fo rthe "political" market, American political scientists and economists likewise often find themselves writing more to influence current politics than to advance specialist knowledge in their fields. The best known of this breed of academic is, of course, Henry Kissinger.

Zbigniew Brzezinski now occupies the influential post of Special Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs. His writings take on special importance thereby and these two books, Political Power: USA/USSR first published in 1963, and Between Two Ages (1969), provide a valuable opportunity to glean something of current thinking at the White House. Both books are attractively presented and offer a clear view of the concerns of a "political" political scientist in the early and late sixties. Dr Brzezinski is a political journalist in British terms and his books ought not to be judged by the more rigorous academic criteria.

Political Power: USA/USSR reflects the preoccupation of Americans with their two-horse competition with Russia in the early Sixties. Dr Brzezinski is particularly interested in examining the comparative strengths and weaknesses of the competitors' political institutions, showing that both are evolving within the confines of each's limitations and respective histories.

He is intent upon demonstrating that the belief, then current, that the Soviet and American systems would grow more similar or "converge" in the long run was unlikely and also undesirable. "Convergence" in his view was more apt to increase competitive tensions than weaken them. Aside from the thesis argued, the book provides a very competent comparison of the American and Russian systems of government and should continue to be invaluable to British readers who know little about either.

In Between Two Ages Dr Brzezinski attempts to argue that the old world of national rivalries and national diplomacy, forces so delicately balanced and manipulated by Dr Kissinger, are really out of date and being replaced rapidly by a global technetronic era. The new age is the product of high technology and new loyalties which transcend narrow national boundaries. The United States, in his view, has the vital role to play of providing the intellectual and political leadership in forging the transitional links of the new age by virtue of its size and economic power and because it is the nation most advanced along the technetronic path.

Certainly this is a stimulating though ostensibly more "political" book than Political Power: USA/USSR. Some of the assumptions about the pace of achieving European unity and the technetronic era seem curiously dated in the post-oil crisis world while in other respects the changes wrought thereby make his message the more compelling. As yet, few people in Britain know much of Dr Brzezinski and his thinking, vital though he and it are to this country. The press and television, so highly favourable to Dr Kissinger, have been suspicious of those who have replaced him.

These two important books are to be welcomed in paperback editions, for they offer some clear and optimistic guides to those post-Kissinger ideas now in favour in the United States.

Good-natured smiles

The New Oxford Book of Light Verse. Edited by Kingsley Amis.
Oxford University Press £4.25. 19 211862 5.
John Masefield: Selected Poems.
Heinemann £5.90. 434 45238 6.

How do you define light verse? Poetry the sixth form will read without prompting? Middle class verse? Funny verse? Kingsley Amis debates the question wittily (and sometimes caustically) in his introduction to The New Oxford Book of Light Verse.

Actually this is not so much The New Oxford Book of Light Verse as the "Kingsley Amis Book of Light Verse". Consequently there is absolutely no point in lamenting this omission of favourite "light" poems or poets nor in querulously niggling over the inclusion of something that seems ponderously heavy or just boring. This is a harmonious and personal anthology which provides the reader with pleasant reunions with old friends and a stimulating array of new acquaintances.

Mr Amis defensively rejects his predecessor's definition of light verse. (The original Oxford Book of Light Verse appeared 40 years ago, edited by W. H. Auden.) Not for Mr Amis the politically committed mix of egalitarian folk song and "popular" ballads. This collection is of verse that "aims to raise a good-natured smile"; verse which is not necessarily funny but certainly not unfunny. Consequently there is nothing laboured, nothing elephantine, nothing cruel. Pope doesn't get a look in but there's plenty of Betjeman, Belloc and Larkin, Noël Coward, Beachcomber and W. S. Gilbert. All are well represented with work which illustrates the editor's conviction that the "light" poet has to work hard at his craft. He is a technician, not a scribbler.

There are guest appearances by Thomas Hardy and Gerard Manley Hopkins, and also plenty of limericks to illustrate another prerequisite of "light" verse: that it should offend decorum. Some of these are very old, others are very funny. For example there is one about "a lesbian girl from Khartoum" and there are others about the proclivities of bishops and fellows of Wadham, Caius and King's. Then there is the barmaid whose breasts "were tattooed with the price of brown ale,/While on her behind,/For the sake of the blind/Was the same information in Braille."

Compared with Auden's anthology, all this may seem irresponsibly escapist—but what else is light verse? Certainly this is exactly the sort of book you'd want read to you if you were lying in the bottom of a punt on the Cherwell, being fed strawberries and cream. It would also be rather nice to read it aloud yourself, last period on a hot Friday afternoon.

John Masefield is not present in Mr Amis's collection; but to celebrate the contenary of his birth, Heinemann has just published his Selected Poems, with an introduction by Sir John Betjeman. As the latter says (in what is very much a piece of gossip between two Laureates), "Masefield did not specialise in brevity". Consequently his Collected Poems "is too unwieldy for modern flats". Hence presumably these Selected Poems (which nevertheless run to over 300 pages). At least they are a useful reminder that this fluent poet wrote much more than "Cargoes" and "Sea-Fever."

Contemporary plus

Hermann Peschmann

Twentieth-Century English Poetry: an Introduction. By Anthony Thwaite.
Heinemann Educational. £3.95. 435 18886 0. £1.30. 435 18887 9.

Anthony Thwaite has considerably expanded and thoroughly revised his Contemporary English Poetry: An Introduction, changing the "vaguely convenient" Contemporary to the "explicit and neutral" Twentieth-Century. After an admirable first chapter on "The Background of Contemporary Poetry", he treats 16 poets in some detail—the names choose themselves. Though in view of his own importance and his pervasive influence on contemporary English poets (not just Larkin), it is surprising not to find Hardy added under the new "neutral" title. Twenty-four other poets receive briefer comment. Again, as with an anthology, we can all think of obvious omissions, but Mr Thwaite rightly wanted to avoid the book's degenerating into a mere catalogue of names.

The whole approach is simple and straightforward, the choice of quotations felicitous without ever being hackneyed. I think he slightly underestimates the significance of Lawrence's poetry, and finds it difficult in 10 pages to do justice to the range and complexity of Yeats. Yet even at this late date he finds, if not new things to say about Hopkins (whose inclusion he amply justifies), at least new ways of approaching him; and on the different kinds of difficulty one first encounters in the work of Eliot and Dylan Thomas he is excellent. There is, too, a nicely balanced appraisal of Auden's earlier with his later work.

The entire book—only 184 pages including short bibliographies—is a model of intelligent compression, sensitivity, and critical discrimination: a useful introduction for sixth-formers, undergraduates, and the general reader.

Pursuit of truth

Ray Bott

Experience and the growth of understanding.
By D. W. Hamlyn.
Routledge and Kegan Paul £6.50. 7100 8735 7.

This book casts much philosophical light on the perplexing problem of how human beings come to gain a purchase on knowledge and understanding, and is essential reading for anyone who purports to be interested in education.

D. W. Hamlyn raises doubts about empiricist and rationalist answers to such a question. In this context modern behaviourism and the rationalism implicit in Chomsky's assumptions about language acquisition in man come under scrutiny. Here he shares a common philosophical standpoint with Piaget. Distinct from his earlier criticisms, Hamlyn offers a more sympathetic appraisal of Piaget's neo-Kantian attempt to weld the stronger elements of the two theories in question into his familiar interactionist model of learning. However, a substantial part of the book provides arguments that raise considerable doubts about its sufficiency.

Accepting Piaget's thesis regarding the emergence of a logic in the developing child, Hamlyn rightly sees difficulties in accounting for a comprehension of objectivity. At a sensory level of experience the child may well accommodate to the causal connexions between the properties of objects and himself. The achievement of a logic is, on its own, insufficient to account for knowledge in the wider sense of socially accepted objective truths. Such understanding involves accommodation to judgments and explanations that characterise support for such claims. There is here no causal connexion in any direct sense.

Hamlyn's objection is taken to imply that there remains a dichotomy between a rationality of belief and a rationality of action that the Piagetian account fails to bridge. Given the pursuit of truth, there would be some compulsion to accommodate to the objective procedures, but there are other principles that can be utilized for classifying and sub-dividing the world, emotional comfort for example. Mere discrimination is not sufficient. On this view a genetic epistemology fails to guarantee initiation into the realm of knowledge. The emergence of a concept of truth takes place within a social condition of others as correctors already established in such modes of understanding.

No interested teacher with at least some philosophical bent could fail to be fascinated with the chapter on the beginnings of understanding. The idea of innate knowledge in some form is rejected, but human mind embodies inborn powers, tendencies and dispositions presupposed by man's capacities to encompass knowledge of the world. The kernel of Hamlyn's positive case is in this chapter, which introduces the fertile notion that emotion and feeling, contrary to a pervasive view, is an essential component of the emergence of rationality and intellectual development. Chapter ten, on teaching, constitutes a substantial break in the continuity of the book, and, though erudite and illuminating, merits more substantial treatment.

This is, on the whole, an interesting and valuable inquiry, worthy to be included among a growing number of works published during recent years on the philosophy of education.

Saved—for whom?

Sebastian Loew

Conservation and Planning. By Alan Dobby.
Hutchinson £6.50. 09 132270 7. £3.25. 09 132271 5.

Having demolished whole districts to "sanitize" cities and carpeted rural areas with suburbia, the Victorians started the conservation movement which still flourishes a century later. And all this time, arguments about the relative values of restoration, repair and conservation have been burning. Experts are divided about the definitions of "character", on whether or not a modern building can be a substitute for an old one and on where money would best be spent. Authors mention the élitist character of conservation in Britain. Governments and institutions start programmes such as the European Architectural Heritage Year, conservation became the planning band-wagon of 1975 and the general public could not care less.

Mr Dobby's book covers the history of the planning legislation related to conservation and its financial framework, lists the activities of a number of interested bodies (SAVE is omitted) and outlines the situation in a random and odd selection of countries.

Unfortunately it gives no new insight into the ways to tackle the issues raised by conservation and, while a number of interesting points are raised, they are not elaborated in any depth. Why is it, for instance, that in other countries, such as the United States or the Soviet bloc, there is no feeling that conservation is for the rich? How and why are conservation areas or listed buildings chosen? What guidelines can be given to select the conservation areas of the twenty-first century?

Instead of giving the details of what happened in some committee of Unesco, it would have been more useful to explore these questions and show, through case studies, the precise problems faced by the practitioner in terms of costs and subsidies, planning applications, changes of population, etc. Past experience could have provided lessons for the future beyond the hackneyed plea for more coordination or for environmental education. Mr Dobby has simply reviewed the present situation of the conservation movement—in which he seems to believe only half-heartedly—and has missed the opportunity of giving new insights on the subject.

De facto curriculum

Norman Evans

Assessing Students: How Shall We know them? By Derek Rowntree. Harper and Row £3.95. 06 318062 6.

Assessing students is an extremely important topic, but it can be a dreadfully dull one. Derek Rowntree brings it to life in a book which is both technical and discursive, whether on the purposes or the side effects of assessment, as well as in chapters on what to assess, how to assess, and how to interpret.

The text is peppered with references, and amply supplied with telling quotations: T. S. Eliot, Lewis Carroll, Samuel Johnson, Mao Tse Tung, Sherlock Holmes, St. Augustine and the Daily Mirror mingle with the more obvious pundits. It is a humane book, whose very humanity underlines the dangerous tendencies for assessment to lapse unwittingly into inhumanity.

But is more than that. "The spirit and style of student assessment defines the de facto curriculum," The last sentence in the first paragraph runs up Rowntree's flag and he keeps it flying throughout. The quality of the education offered is what he has in mind consistently, and all the various aspects of assessment which are explored serve to show that quality is governed by the way teachers and systems conceive and practise assessment. The book concludes with a 17-point programme for doing the job in a civilized, effective way, and a suggestion that "certificates and profiles should carry a government health warning. Relying too heavily on other people's opinions can damage your sense of reality."

Rowntree's stance could not be made more clear. This might suggest that he is against assessment; but he is not. He is concerned that assessments should assess what they claim to assess and through wanting teachers to work out what they are going to assess before they begin teaching, he is pleading for assessors to be aware of what they are doing.

There is a difficulty in all this; however, which neither Rowntree nor anyone else can remove. It's all very well to say that assessment can be descriptive without being judgmental, but in a technological world obsessed with qualifications, people will contrive to read judgments into descriptive assessments. And as schools get rocked in the backwash of under- if not un-employment, it is possible that judgments will be demanded more insistently.

Remote viewing

Robert Silvey

Mind-reach: Scientists Look at Psychic Ability. By Russell Targ and Harold Puthoff.
Jonathan Cape £4.95. 224 01224 2.

This is an account, preceded by a commendatory introduction by Margaret Mead, of a lengthy series of ESP experiments by the two authors—both physicists. The work was done at the Electronics and Bioengineering Laboratory of the Stanford Research Institute in Palo Alto, California and has already been publicised in "Nature". Though the book is intended primarily for the general reader, it includes enough detail about the research procedures used to enable anyone with similar laboratory equipment to replicate the experiments.

Much of the authors' work was concerned with "remote-viewing"—the capacity of subjects to describe or draw specific distant locations randomly selected as "targets". It was found that this capacity was not confined to renowned "psychics"; it was exhibited in some degree by all the hundred subjects tested.

Uri Geller was among these. They ruefully declare that their work with him absorbed three per cent of their time but was accorded 97 per cent of the publicity given to their work. And much of this was misleading. Not the least valuable part of the book is a discussion of the nature of the criticism which investigators of ESP must expect.

The authors suggest that, in the light of current thinking on the frontiers of physics, the time is coming when psychic ability will cease to be regarded as inconsistent with "the laws of nature".

Destination France: Part 1. By D. L. Ellis and M. R. Pearce.
Harrap. Teacher's Book £2.25. Pupils Book £1.50.

European Schoolbooks of Cheltenham have been serving modern language teachers well by making available not only books but also many other educational aids published on the Continent. If Direct French Conversation and Histoires Drôles are typical of material which they can market from the United States, then it would be preferable if they continued to bring us the best from across the Channel rather than the decidedly shoddy from across the Atlantic.

Book One of Direct French Conversation was first published in 1966 and followed five years later by Book Two, in which some of the more blatant spelling errors in French (jetter, vignt, arithmátique, pupitre) have been corrected. The purpose of these books, we are told, is to teach students to speak French, but, in the apparent absence of accompanying tapes, they would achieve this only if the teacher (and he would have to be a very good one) so decided.

Each chapter consists of a reading passage followed by questions. The first passage begins with simple line drawings accompanied by questions and answers as found in many a course book, such as: "Qu'est-ce que c'est? C'est un livre", and then, suddenly, in the middle of the text one finds: "Le professeur doit poursuivre l'enquête en désignant de la main d'autres objets et en posant les questions: Qu'est-ce? Qu'est-ce que c'est? Qu'est-ce que c'est que cela?" It would appear that the authors were unable to make up their collective mind about whether they were writing for the pupil or the teacher.

In any case, the dull format would be most unlikely to attract or motivate the average pupil (or the average teacher, for that matter): there are no photographs, only a few drawings, and the questions, although numbered, are printed in continuous paragraphs instead of each on a new line; each chapter contains a section entitled Mots nouveaux de la leçon, again in continuous paragraphs rather than in columns, and which, horror of horrors, includes isolated words completely out of any meaningful context, such as ce, une, cela, quel, quelle, nationalité, elle (just like that). For the teacher these lists might just conceivably be of some use, (although hardly in this format), while the pupils would only find himself in a highly dangerous and utterly confusing lexical quagmire.

Histoires Drôles is little better, although the proof-reader was wider awake this time, the format is more pleasing to the eye and the questions, dialogs (sic, of course) and other exercises are more clearly set out. The stories, told in the present tense, and the accompanying drawings, are genuinely amusing and appealing, if somewhat corny, although it is a pity that more effort was not put into making the drawings more French in character: in one we see a man waving a bundle of dollar-bills which the text refers to as cinquante francs.

The comprehensive vocabulary at the back of the book may well puzzle an English pupil with its Americanisms (candies, movies, fired), and if pupils are expected to understand "country of provenance" (pays d'origine) and "a resourceful chap" (le débrouillard), one wonders why le vitrier is rendered, not as "glazier" but as "a man who replaces window-panes". Are there no glaziers in America? I would tolerate this book in my classroom, but not highly recommend it.

How refreshing it is to turn to Ian MacDonald's little book, which comes from the chalk-face of the London comprehensive in which he teaches. The material is designed to test pupils' comprehension of genuine and relevant items which they may well come across on a visit to France: signs, notices and advertisements. The questions are all in English, and answers are invited in English, which avoids the criticism which one must level against so many so-called "comprehension" books (and, for that matter, "comprehension" tests and examination questions) that they simultaneously demand the practice of the skills of interpreting a French question and of answering it in French.

*I wonder, however, whether this is intended to be a teaching or a testing book, and I cannot entirely agree with Mr MacDonald's own grading in order of difficulty: there is little, for example, that the pupil could deduce from the first item (a weather forecast), unless he had come across the vocabulary beforehand. On the other hand, in the later advertisements much of the vocabulary (agences de voyages, téléphone, l'air y est conditionné) could be deduced by comparison with the English.

Pamela Symond's book is one of a series entitled French from France and is accompanied by filmstrips and tapes, not under review here. Each simple story (again, all in the present tense) is well illustrated with clear photographs in comic-strip style. The real coutançais characters visit the railway station, the post office and the shops, and in general the material is relevant to French life and to a visit to France which an English pupil might be expected to make. Questions and other exercises follow the stories. Exercises which particularly appealed to me as suitable for younger or less able pupils were those in which sentences had to be made up from given words and phrases, or in which beginnings and ends of sentences had to be correctly joined. A reference vocabulary seems to be an unfortunate but small omission in an otherwise commendable little volume.

Destination France (say it in English or in French) is described as a "survival language course" and is designed primarily for 13-year-old students "who have already had two years of inconclusive or unsuccessful contact with French in the classroom". (What a nice way of putting it).

I have used this course with 11-year-olds as part of the language element in a European studies course for the less able, an alternative use also suggested by the authors. The principle on which the book, and the accompanying tape and flashcards, is built is that each of the 10 "achievements" is complete in itself; in spite of the fact that the authors still refer to the "course", the language content is not graded.

In addition to doing much the same as Mr MacDonald's book in terms of comprehension, Destination France also aims to encourage the pupil to speak, although not to write, French. In each section the pupil will be able to read some useful background information in English, accompanied by photographs, often of signs and notices, hear, read and eventually reproduce (orally) his part of four almost identical dialogues and answer questions in English on the material. Accompanying the books is also a set of 24 spirit duplicating masters which provide answer grids for various forms of exploitation which are suggested very helpfully and clearly in the teacher's book.

Part one of the course envisages the student abroad but on an organized visit where necessary initiatives are few; parts two and three are promised to envisage him respectively as the spokesman on a family holiday and on a visit to a French family. Any pupil whose academic sights are set low but whose ultimate destination is France will benefit from this very attractively produced course.

Logical Spelling. By B. V. Allan.

Ward Lock Educational £1.10. 7062 3663 7.
The Reading Handbook. By John Hughes.
Evans £1.20. 237 291908.

For some time we have been in dire need of classroom material and workable advice about the teaching of spelling, going beyond the giving out of lists and admonitions to copy out words three times. B. V. Allan's Logical Spelling is an attempt to give us classroom material. It is addressed directly to the child or the student (for it has an obvious application to adult literacy courses) and it teaches, one at a time, over 50 spelling rules.

I should say in passing that I believe we have allowed ourselves to be bamboozled by clichés about the irregularity of English spelling into forgetting that, first, there are rules which work and, secondly, that many of the irregularities turn out to be capable of logical expression when you look at them closely enough. The author, relying heavily upon her own experience of teaching the scheme, prescribes in detail the way that the student should set out and store the written work which accumulates as he does the exercises. While some of this advice might seem laboured, I am content to accept that if the job is to be done methodically, we may as well try what the author has found to be successful.

The book looks, at first glance, forbiddingly formal and prescriptive. The teacher's notes at the back, though, which need to be carefully read, show that the scheme has enough flexibility for teachers. For instance, although the book could be used to class lessons on spelling rules, own approach would be to set child to "do" a rule as and when he needed it. A highly motivated adult class might well accept something more formal.

The sentences with missing words are sometimes very uninspired, and the book could be generally a bit more good humoured. But until something else comes along, this is the ideal book for every teacher who feels guilty and inadequate every time he crosses out a misspelt word.

Mike Torbe's book is aimed at the teacher, but it has the same intent as Logical Spelling: to provide a practical classroom answer to an enormously complicated problem. He discusses the nature of spelling errors, and gives strategies for dealing with them. The approach is a little different from B. V. Allan's in that he places emphasis not so much upon rules as upon the discovery and classification of the words, each child is getting wrong.

The general philosophy of the two authors is similar, however. Both, for example, place emphasis on the "look, cover, write" strategy which is so simple, so little used and yet so effective. Torbe's reiterated maxim, "The teacher's job is not to correct mistakes the pupil has already made but to help him not to make that mistake next time", is also implicit in B. V. Allan's work.

The Reading Handbook is exactly what its sub-title suggests: "A Dictionary Guide to the Teaching of Reading." Despite its slimness and apparent simplicity, it contains an enormous amount of information, with plenty of pointers and references about where to go for more detail. Like many good dictionaries, it is susceptible to the happy abuse of being read cover to cover, and the teacher who treats it in this way will know a lot more about teaching reading than he did before he started. The appendices on reading schemes and other material are excellent and informative.

Many books have been published recently to meet the growing intrest in mushrooms, although a identification of fungi has yet to be published. Mushrooms in the Wild takes a broad sweep at the subject, beginning with a brief account of the structure of fungi and their classification and functions, and then describing the larger fungi by habitat. The text, which is hard to penetrate, carries out these tasks in a bland manner, the generalizing tone conveying none of the enchantment of discovering fungi. The excellent illustrations give it an attractive appearance, but cannot hope to make it a book of lasting interest and value to the general reader.

Lost quarry

Fieldwork in geology. By I. M. Simpson.
George Allen and Unwin £1.75. 04 550025 8.

Geology teachers, examiners and lecturers put great emphasis on fieldwork, and most O and A level syllabuses specify the number of days pupils should spend in the field. So there should be a good market for a book that introduces pupils to field techniques. Dr Simpson's book outlines, for beginners with very little geological background, the use of topographic and geological maps, geological hammers, the hand lens, tape measures for measuring rock thicknesses, clinometers, and includes some brief comments on suitable clothing. Regrettably, the importance of wearing "hard hats" in quarries and beneath cliff faces is not mentioned, although the "code of conduct" reproduced on the back cover does contain such advice as far as quarries are concerned.

Unfortunately, the author seems to have lost sight of his original intention to write a book about fieldwork. Over half the book's 72 pages are devoted to the identification of minerals, rocks and fossils—topics covered by many other books and ones that are best commenced in the laboratory after a field excursion

Many items that would be immensely useful in the field are missing from this book: adequate instructions on using a clinometer; a simple compilation of symbols for use on both maps and logs of rock successions; proper identification keys rather than the tabular format used; true scale photos or drawings depicting, for comparative purposes, grain sizes and shapes. Many of the photos are inappropriate, and the field sketches are a disaster, showing no scale or orientation. Geological fieldwork deserves better than this.

Nuclear get-together

WALT PATTERSON assesses new materials on nuclear energy

Until recently the United Kingdom nuclear establishment has been its own worst enemy. Since the inception of civil nuclear activities more than 20 years ago, United Kingdom policy has been riven by internal controversy, bickering and bitterness. Disagreements about choice of technology, timing and size of programmes have been stubborn and bad-tempered. But the infighting has been mostly behind the scenes, attracting little attention except among the cognoscenti. Of late, however, an additional factor has entered the picture, a gradually mounting public disquiet about nuclear issues.

In the last three years nuclear safety, radioactive waste management and nuclear weapons proliferation have all become front-page news. Plans to expand nuclear fuel reprocessing at Windscale, to supply enriched uranium to Brazil, to carry out test drilling for waste disposal sites, and to construct new nuclear power stations and a full-scale fast breeder reactor have all generated heated debate—and this time the debate is not confined only to the nuclear factions themselves. Accordingly, although the internal dissension continues, the United Kingdom nuclear establishment has been impelled to organize a united front to present to the public.

Seven major United Kingdom nuclear organizations have now pooled their public relations efforts to call attention to "the wide range of information on nuclear power available to schools, colleges and the general public". On June 1 educational journalists were treated to a guided tour of the available material, including films, a slide-tape show, reports, brochures, pamphlets, papers and a portable exhibition on "nuclear power for schools".

The organizations taking part in the presentation were the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority, British Nuclear Fuels Ltd, the Nuclear Power Company Ltd, the Electricity Council, the Central Electricity Generating Board, the South of Scotland Electricity Board and the British Nuclear Forum, a trade association of industries involved in nuclear matters. They introduced a joint pamphlet, Information on Nuclear Power, listing the various categories of materials on offer, with their sources. Copies of the printed materials were distributed, two films and a slide-tape show were presented, and the portable exhibition was on display.

'Nuclear Generation' is a 17-minute colour film, now available in 16mm and video, made in 1976 for the CEGB, which shows the interaction of a nuclear power station and the day-to-day life of the local community. The film intercuts glossy footage of scenic power stations and clinical interiors with man-in-the-street interviews apparently inspired by ITV "natural breaks", and with instructional playlets whose stilted dialogue evoked embarrassed snickers from the viewers. The film contains a great deal of worthwhile and informative detail, but the flavour is unambiguously that of a sales-pitch, and an unsubtle sales-pitch at that. Whether it will produce the desired effect on a roomful of hard-bitten fifth and sixth-formers must be doubted.

The film also includes some commentary which is tendentious to say the least Calder Hall is labelled "the first commercial nuclear power station in the world". It was nothing of the kind, but rather a weapons-plutonium production facility generating electricity as a by-product under entirely non-commercial criteria. A shot of the Wylfa Magnox station is accompanied by a remark to the effect that "the stations have all run very safely and successfully". Wylfa, however, was more than five years late in reaching full power, as a result of major design flaws and problems of operation and maintenance. According to one passage, "No one is ever exposed" to radiation; but another notes that "special film badges record any rediations to which (staff) may have been exposed".

Energy—the Nuclear Option is a 10-minute colour film, now available in 16mm and video, made in 1977 for the UKAEA. It is stylistically crisper than the CEGB film, using voice-over rather than in-shot actors speaking to the camera, and less likely to elicit laughter in the wrong places. But it is likewise a sales-pitch, this time more particularly for the fast breeder reactor. Time is running out, the film claims, and only the breeder will be able to save us from freezing in the dark. Since the film was made for the UKAEA by the National Coal Board, there is a certain irony in this theme. In any case, both the CEGB and the AEA films suffer from a common attribute. From first to last each film refuses to concede that there is any basis whatever for any kind of concern about any aspect of nuclear activities. To a newcomer, the effect must be that each film "doth protest too much"; and it is hard to believe that a sceptical school audience will be reassured.

The AEA's slide-tape show on Safety and Nuclear Power may be better suited to cope with this problem, because the AEA always sends a speaker along with the show. If the speaker is prepared to acknowledge that, for instance, the Flowers report and the Fox report raise issues of substance, an AEA school visit is undoubtedly likely to prove illuminating and productive. The AEA is now writing to schools all over the United Kingdom offering its services; an AEA spokesman estimates that the AEA has sent speakers to some 400 schools in the London area alone in the past 12 months. The portable exhibition is now also on offer.

The AEA has always produced high quality printed public relations material. Recent additions to its output deal with nuclear energy in general, with the fast reactor, and with radioactive waste disposal. These popular handouts tell, of course, only part of the story, but they do at least give the industry's side of nuclear issues comprehensibly and unambiguously; anyone who would like to hear the other side of a nuclear issue now probably has a pretty clear idea of where to look.

One AEA publication must, however, be given particular mention. The monthly magazine Atom, free from the AEA, is very good value even if it has to be purchased. It has just been given a major facelift, and switched to an A4 format. Each issue includes well-written articles on a variety of aspects of nuclear affairs by senior nuclear experts, plus Parliamentary excerpts, book reviews, and other material of interest to anyone desiring to keep track of nuclear developments. It is to be sure the voice of the AEA, with the AEA viewpoint editorially. But it gives its readers credit for having enough intelligence to weigh evidence and opinion and form their own views. Highly recommended.

BNFL and NPC likewise produce a range of informative material, some giving a general overview and some focusing on particular activities or facilities. The CEGB also reprints speeches and papers by its senior staff in a regular News Letter. One recent curiosity from the CEGB South Eastern Region is a gaudy brochure entitled Nuclear Know-How! which is a throwback to the wildest days of the 1950s, a shrill cartoon-strip which is bound to leave any reader lacking a physics degree both baffled and irritated. This type of flashy obscurantism has long been a major cause of the public confusion about nuclear energy; it is fortunately otherwise long since absent from the public relations productions by the United Kingdom nuclear establishment.

An AEA spokesman, introducing the June 1 gathering, declared that the nuclear community has "nothing to hide". It would be pleasant to be able to agree wholeheartedly with this laudable sentiment; and indeed the various organizations represented have in general been cooperative and helpful in making information available even to those who are known to be unenthusiastic about nuclear doings. However, there is a singular omission from all this range of material. Nowhere—except in Atom—is any mention made of the problem which is now preoccupying governments and nuclear experts worldwide: the effect of civil nuclear development on nuclear weapons proliferation. Schools and teachers who are in search of enlightenment rather than mere reassurance might find that civil and military nuclear activities is a good point on which to open the class discussion when the friendly neighbourhood AEA salesman comes to call.

What do you think of it so far?

Keep Britain Tidy Group, Brighton Polytechnic, Grand Parade, Brighton BNZ 2JY, £8.

Litter is a learning kit for seven to nine-year-olds, intended to support and stimulate a multi-faceted project of six to eight weeks' duration, or even a whole term, which will increase children's awareness of environmental problems.

The kit is excellent, and highly recommended. Just what any teacher with infinite time, resources and energy would put together themselves. It opens up great possibilities for learning and enjoyment.

The backbone of the project is a set of 37 cards (coated for durability), each of which constitutes a basically self-explanatory assignment for one or more children. The first seven are instructions for surveying and analysing litter inside and outside the school. Then come six cards of projects in the maths-science area: weighing and measuring, and experimenting with what happens to litter left in water or soil over time, and with the effects of the wind. The rest of the set move out into further explorations, writing, drama and art activities, and the investigation of packaging and of recycling.

The splendidly detailed teacher's handbook analyses each card, indicating which projects need help and which stand on their own; listing equipment required; and dealing with safety precautions, logistics, and potential further work around each project.

The kit also includes a film strip and accompanying booklet, intended for initial orientation; the images chosen are not particularly inspiring, but should serve the purpose unless teachers have time and resources to substitute other pictures of greater excitement.

The booklet, again, gives extremely full background information on the slides; and the kit also includes three wall-posters, "Dangerous Litter", "Then and Now" (the historical development of refuse collection and public hygiene), and "Glass Recycling".

The information on recycling is one of the outstanding features of this kit; it covers a wide range of possibilities, from re-use of waste materials within the school to detailed information on the potential of litter as a source of funds either for the school itself or for charity (addresses of existing schemes are provided).

Another pleasing feature is the way material is organized to allow for the systematic following througg of complete processes and cycles: from manufacture through use to disposal, and beyond to the long-term results of different means of disposal. The kit is also strong on litter in the countryside, its disastrous effects on animals, plants, and natural cycles.

All in all, Litter is an exceptionally successful use of the learning kit formula, based on several years of research on the best methods of increasing children's awareness of litter and their sense of responsibility about it (a similar kit for the next age-group up already exists).

Teachers should find that the kit is flexible enough to fit in with a number of different modes of school organization; although it is intended as the basis of a major, ongoing project (involving outdoor work, by the way, and so suitable for good weather terms only), much of the material can be used in morelimited and specific ways.

The handbook will be gratefully received, anticipating as it does so many of the details of logistics and organization which take up so much of the teacher's time.

Understanding computers

Sir,—Mr M. J. Coleman (May 26) writes that computer studies must be based upon the study of a machine. But is it essential for students to have an understanding of how a computer works? For the majority I would say no. I drive a car, take photographs with a camera that has a built-in exposure control and my wife uses an automatic washing machine. Neither of us is interested in the workings of these devices, we know how to use them and if they go wrong then we call an engineer. Computers are similar, the majority of people do not need to know how a computer works but more importantly, what a computer can and cannot be used for.

The emphasis should be placed on computer awareness and not the technical level of computer science. As was stated computers can be studied at CSE O and A level. The A level is a must for entry to the computer industry and useful for courses in higher education. The O level gives a basic grounding in computer studies and opens up the possibility of new interests for students through their project programming. The CSE is similar to O level in syllabus content and it is here that I believe changes should be made. I see no point in teaching computer history, logic units, etc to students at this level. Instead, applications of computers in areas that may affect students such as transport, banking, hospitals and law enforcement should be studied. Any practical work should be with program packages, not the writing of programs in BASIC or some other language.

Mr Coleman highlighted some of the problems that can occur in a school that has access to a computer through a single terminal. Some of these problems are caused I believe by the teacher. Is it necessary for students' programs to be interactive? In most cases it is not, as the data may be included in the program. Therefore the students or member of staff can punch the programs into paper tape which can be read into the computer as required. There are distinct advantages; students cannot monopolise the terminal when it is connected to the computer, connect time is used more efficiently because editing is performed off-line, students are forced to be more disciplined in their work and the work can be supervised more easily. Some establishments do not know how to use their computer resources effectively. Why use a POT modem which ties the terminal to one location when with an acoustic coupler the terminal may be used anywhere there is a telephone? Why not purchase a visual display unit or DIY kit with a monitor socket so that television sets can be attached? A new form of visual aid is then available which allows a whole class to see the output from a computer at the same time.

The idea of mobile sources of computing power is not new to industry or education. Mini computers have been transported between schools in Scotland so that remote establishments could have access to computer facilities. The suggestion that more authorities adopt the idea of mobile computers is not feasible because of the difficulty of getting maximum use out of the equipment by schools with independently produced timetables. The needs of schools can be better satisfied with micro computers as these devices are cheap, portable and flexible. Several micro computers can be obtained for the price of a mini computer.

Schools need not justify the purchase of a micro computer purely on the needs of a computer studies course. There are programes available at little or no cost that have been written for subjects other than computing such as physics, chemistry, economics, biology, engineering and English. A school should therefore consider a micro computer as an investment for all subjects taught within the school which can be used at any time.

Industrial games

by Carolyn O'Grady

A group of pupils at Drayton School, Banbury, Oxfordshire, were last week putting the finishing touches to a printed circuit soldering jig they have designed and made. The jig is of immensely topical use. It holds a printed circuit in place while the electronic components are soldered on it.

When the time comes to solder the other side of the board, the clutch which holds it in place is loosened and the jig turned over. The jig, unlike those at present used in industry, is adjustable for different board sizes, is light and can be turned over easily.

The making of original products is not new in schools, but what is different here is that the Drayton school team designed their prototype and built their jig after consultation with local firms. They have also evaluated the prototype, again in consultation with local industry and designed a promotional campaign.

The school, along with all 42 secondary schools in Oxfordshire, is taking part in a comptition organized by Oxfordshire County Council and sponsored by Alkan Aluminium (UK) Ltd, which aims to foster links between schools and industry and also to cultivate a more realistic attitude to industry. It has also attracted the interest of the Department of Industry which has contributed £250 through the PETT (Project Engineering and Technology of Tomorrow) scheme. The competition entries are being judged this week.

Schools taking part have to imagine themselves as part of the commercial world. They have to indentify a need for a product, develop it, modify it as necessary and devise a marketing and promotional campaign for it.

The work which the Drayton school team has put into the project is a good example of the sort of approach that the organisers are trying to foster. They visited a number of electronics firms in the area and in other ways researched what was needed.

The prototype went through several stages before it satisfied their own exacting requirements. Before designing the advertising campaign pupils, had talks with representatives from local firms on advertising and marketing strategies, and they thoroughly worked out a sales promotion campaign: documentation includes, for example, a cost efficiency study of advertising in various journals based on the cost of an advertisement, the magazine's circulation and the frequency of publication. They have designed their own advertisements.

Another competition entry which has been based on thorough research into the market it is aimed at is a chair designed by one boy at Banbury School. Clive Southernwood, a 17-year-old, didn't like the armchairs in the school lounge and decided to design and make his own.

School chairs were not the only point of reference, however. Clive also wrote copious notes on the good and bad points of lounge chairs pictured in magazines he collected, and also researched thoroughly each design feature of his chair in terms of aesthetics, comfort and safety.

Probably the most unusual product in the competition has been made by a team from Chipping Norton School. Pupils here were experimenting with frameworks for soap films when they found that when rolled along a table or the ground the frames moved spontaneously in rather interesting ways. This discovery has led them to produce the frameworks in a variety of shapes and sizes as children's and "executive" toys.

Their latest idea is for a framework large enough to support a child or even an adult inside it. They have yet to come up with a workable prototype, but are already comparing the possible thrill of rolling around inside the "roller rocker", as it is called, with that of skateboarding. The school has received overtures from industry and has taken the precaution of patenting the "rocker".

The exhibition of entries at County Hall, Oxford, will be open to the public free of charge on Saturday June 17th from 10.00 a.m. to 4.00 p.m., Monday June 19 from 2.30 p.m. to 4.00 p.m., and on Tuesday June 20 from 2.00 p.m. to 8.00 p.m. Prizes will be presented by His Royal Highness the Duke of Gloucester on Monday June 19 and the judging panel includes David Barnett, Head of Industrial Design at the Design Council, Peter Blood, Director General, Institute of Marketing, and R. Symes-Schutzmann, of the BBC's Tomorrow's World.

Matters of life and death

Life Assurance, an industrial analysis
J. D. Crewdson and S. H. Adams.
£3.50 post free from LOA/ASLO Information Centre, 60 Cheapside, London EC2V 6AX.

This is the first of a series of study kits for "A" Level Economics, intended to provide teachers with material which can be used to illustrate and examine economic principles, within the context of existing syllabuses. It is published in conjunction with the Economics Association, and is financially assisted by the Life Offices' Association, hence the very low price for the pack. Unlike most resource kits, it contains only written material—enough for twelve students to use. First there is an eighteen page source book, designed to give the background of statistical information concerning the life assurance industry and the economic environment within which it operates. The statistics are well presented, but unfortunately only cover the period up to 1974.

The main part of the kit consists of six units, each four pages long, which aim to use the life assurance industry as a case study to exemplify economic principles. Topic 1 is "Life Assurance as a Service Sector Industry". It provides the opportunity to examine the Standard Industrial Classification, and to reflect upon the kind of output that a service industry like life assurance has. As with all the topics, the final page is devoted to seven assignments which could form the basis of class discussion. The second topic "Structural Change in the UK Economy", examines the growth of the British economy and different sectoral consequences of the rising standard of living.

The next topic is "Life Assurance as a Business Organization". Here a short section discusses the aims of such organizations.

In "The Nature of Growth," the controversial question of how to define economic growth is treated. Various criteria for measuring growth are considered, and these are once again related to the life assurance industry. Topic five, "The Analysis of Industrial Costs", examines the nature of fixed and variable costs in life assurance, and the extent to which economies of scale can be made. Like all the topics, the basic introductory theoretical exposition is too brief and superficial for students of A level better to assume knowledge of the analysis and concentrate on the application of the theory to the life assurance industry.

The final topic, "The Theory of the Firm in the Service Sector", considers aims, productivity and efficiency and the nature of profits.

It shows how the state of competition in the industry is influenced by imperfect consumer knowledge, the method of selling and barriers of entry.

This life assurance kit shares with materials produced by the banks, the Stock Exchange, the Building Societies and other similar organizations, the characteristic that it is heavily subsidized.

However, it would be wrong for teachers to buy such resources simply because they are cheap—schools' resource centres are littered with dusty kits of this type. This study kit may have some use for A-level students, though life assurance is not normally treated on the A-level course and teachers may feel they lack sufficient background knowledge about the industry. Some of the topics might be used in commerce classes at a lower level in the school or in some business studies classes in technical colleges. It can, however, be said that, in spite of close scrutiny, of the material, the PR aspects of the exercises do not obtrude.

Broader English

Arnold Levin

"Would it be a good idea to refer to Silent Spring with 1984 and Brave New World in my next essay?" asked Allen. "I've finished Tess. Should I try to read another novel by next weekend or some of Hardy's stories?"—an anxious inquiry from Kay.

"Can you help me with an essay title for the African plays?"—Judy's problem. "I'd like to write a story in three sections for the personal writing, one part in each unit. Is that acceptable?"—Mark's idea. Never again shall I read Ferlinghetti's Underwear without recalling Beverley's forthright views, expressed to a group fortunately closeted in my office.

All these students were in my fifth year O level literature set last year, following our internally devised syllabus for the Oxford and Cambridge Schools Examination Board's internal English literature option. Half the marks are awarded for coursework, half for a conventionally examined Shakespeare text chosen from the three set annually for all their candidates by the board.

From a yearly intake of about 280 in a mixed comprehensive, some 60 in the fifth form, and possibly a dozen in the lower sixth, take this English literature course. Nearly all our fifth form candidates have gained Grade C or above in English Language O level in their fourth year, so they are free to concentrate upon an exclusively literature course.

To ensure the success of this policy, our third year classes—taught by choice in mixed-ability classes—are given an objective test, and the results, moderated by their English teachers' assessments, determine the setting for the fourth year.

Of course we do make mistakes, and at times in the fourth and fifth years we may have to move students from an O level to a CSE set, or vice-versa. We are free to do this because of our blocked timetabling system.

After the June O level our fourth year students receive copies of our literature syllabus with an explanatory letter for parents. A considerable amount of work on literature will have been covered in the fourth year, including a Shakespeare play, though not the one which will be required for their fifth year examination.

Work on the syllabus begins in September of year five. From eight thematically arranged units, three will have to be selected and completed, one in each of the first three half terms of the year.

Just before Easter, the "Long Essay", a project of at least 1,500 words, will be written under examination conditions, but with books and notes available and no time restriction. Finally comes the Shakespeare examination paper in June.

Four essays on literature and some personal, creative writing must be handed in by half term for unit one. For this unit the class works together on one of the eight available topics.

Last year I took "Youth and Love": Cider with Rosie, some short stories and poems by D. H. Lawrence, a few of Donne's love poems, and a work by Stan Barstow.

Units two and three are similar in their demands, but with them comes choice for the students. Science fiction is popular, as is "War: Death and Glory?" "Fate and Destiny", centred on Hardy, appeals strongly to some girls. American literature, "The American Scene", is often used as a class unit and is always well-supported.

Few will select "Africa—the Clash of Cultures", but this choice is usually extremely well done. The teacher becomes a roving advice-centre, hard-pressed for time, helping individuals to make choices, taking groups in corners, setting titles, urging the reluctant to read, think, and write, write, write.

Most students develop their long essays from an aspect of their unit studies. An author may be examined in more detail, or works by different authors contrasted.

The essays are usually two or three times the stipulated 1,500 word minimum. Some students have problems in choosing their topic and one has to be set; but it is unusual for a student to get to write on an author or book we consider unsuitable.

Half term four in part, and all of half term five are used for the Shakespeare play. We often wonder if we have sufficient time in hand, but our average success rate is over 83 per cent (grade C or above), and there is a reasonable proportion of grade As every year.

Problems do occur. Deadlines for completion of units have to be enforced. Especially for the ill-organized and over-conscientious student, there may be stress and anxiety. Students may choose books or whole units they find uncongenial.

Every year a few fail to produce sufficient coursework for the first two units and have to take CSE literature, or gain no certificate, although all will have an O Level language award.

There are some difficulties for staff. Units and long essays have to be internally marked, and standards from both fifth year sets and the lower sixth one have to be moderated, although all the long essays are sent to Oxford for the board to reassess.

We cannot all claim to be familiar with all the material on the syllabus, so students may be sent to colleagues for help and advice, or the students themselves may well teach us.

Against the difficulties in the operation of any courses-work-based English examination must be set the helpfulness of the Oxford and Cambridge Board. Modifications to the syllabus have always been accepted, and the board's reports on candidates' work has been a valued service—a very different approach to that adopted by another board with which we operate Mode III examinations at a lower level.

Our only regret is the board's allocation of 50 per cent of the available marks to a single formally examined play, for though we might wish to retain the study of a Shakespeare text, we think it carries an excessive proportion of the grade.

Our students have had a far broader experience than any conventionally examined, three set-text, memory-testing O level literature syllabus would allow. Much of the work produced may be routine, even dull; but the vast majority of our students will never study literature again in any formal environment, and the experience they gain is different.

For some it may be the creative writing element contained in the units which provides the most satisfaction, and we often receive work in this area of a high quality. The element of student choice for the long essay and two of the units encourages a level of commitment to the course we would not ordinarily expect from many candidates.

Barbara's ambitiously titled long essay, "Metaphysical Poetry", would have pleased my professor. Three years ago, Frances—now studying medicine—showed she knew far more than me about "Dracula and the Development of Horror in Literature". Yesterday, Kevin called in to school. He is an apprentice electrician now. "It was hard work, that course last year, but, yeah, it was good fun." He gained grade E.

Close down the kitchens

Judith Stares

There must be a strong case, at least in primary schools, for abolition of hot meals by courtesy of the state.

The children come from a relatively small catchment area, and few need leave home before 8.30 a.m. or arrive back later than 3.45 p.m. Certainly, many mothers work, and homes are empty at midday, so provision must be made for the children to eat their home-prepared meals.

But surely that responsibility is all that should be expected or required of school management. Kitchen staff, and, indeed, kitchen buildings, would become superfluous. The money saved could be spent in providing a squad of supervisors for the sandwich brigade. Teachers could then retire from this tortured battle-front, concentrate on their prime ta

Wildlife surveys

Roy Smith

It is fine learning about rare species such as the otter, osprey, large blue butterfly and lady's slipper orchid, but few children can understand about them without seeing them. There is, however, much to be learned about wildlife at local level, and this is where teachers can involve pupils.

During the past two summers, pupils at our school have carried out three different wildlife surveys; on small mammals, butterflies and wild daffodils. The daffodil survey serves as a good example of how simple, yet effective such a method of involvement can be.

Last spring the pupils were asked to report if they saw any wild daffodils. This species was chosen for study because it is easily recognizable, being different from garden varieties, and also because it is not very common in Derbyshire.

At first information was rather slow in forthcoming, mainly because pupils seem more interested in more active forms of wildlife such as mammals and birds, and they regarded looking for wild flowers as unfashionable.

However, as soon as a few pupils started to give information, others overcame their reservations, and a spirit of competition was created. The pupils also saw that the information they had gathered was to be put to good use.

It was passed on to the local museum and the naturalists' trust. This is an important aspect—that however trivial it may seem, information should be passed on to interested bodies.

The information was then marked on a map, once a satisfactory map reference had been obtained. This proved to be rather a problem, as pupils, especially in the lower years, found it difficult to relate actual places to those on a map.

The sites were visited after school, if possible accompanied by the pupils who had given the information. Going with them allowed that their information was being treated seriously.

Some of the sites had been known to the pupils concerned for many years, but their significance had not been realized. Perhaps the best comment came from one boy, who after finding daffodils on his farm, said: "I thought it was funny they were a lot smaller."

This is a good observation. Until the pupils had been made aware of the fact that the wild daffodil differed from the garden varieties, they had assumed all daffodils were the same.

The outcome was that we added a further nine sites to the 17 already known for the county. One site was of major importance, being the largest in the county. Many more than nine pupils were involved. Several reported the same sites, and there were also a few false alarms.

Continuing throughout the summer, many pupils came forward with extra pieces of information about wild flowers and wildlife in general.

Two plus two makes sense

D. W. Crompton

The characteristics of our new BEd honours course can be quickly summarized:

A two-year first period of study similar to a normal university course, during which the student takes two academic subjects, one at main level and one at subsidiary. Threequarters of the time and emphasis is given to the main subject; one quarter to subsidiary. Education is not taught as an academic subject, and there is no professional element.

A second period of two years devoted entirely and exclusively to educational studies and professional training, involving the schools in both planning and oversight.

The full four-year course leading to a classified BEd with honours.

Arrangements allowing students losing commitment to teaching to transfer into the third year of degree courses elsewhere.

If this is strongly reminiscent of a James-type structure, it is not to say that the idea came from there. There is a tendency to think the James Committee invented the idea of consecutive training. In fact, it was the Robbins Report that prompted early discussions along such lines in several colleges.

At Westminster, long before the James Committee had met, the Academic Board was discussing possibility of "re-thinking nature of colleges' courses" so students, inter alia, "should be to delay their commitment to tea ing".

What James did was to the view that such thinkin become a reality. For one period it almost seemed as Oxford University itself might to such a formula when, part of the official response James Report, a new type BEd on consecutive lines was con ded as a possibility.

But the White Paper this, and lack of agreement colleges within the ATOs as best system of training led evitable compromises and, case, the loss of the universi nection in all save the post-gra area.

The necessity to go it alone CNAA, however, had the adv that we could revert to the consecutive structure we had believed in. Not that there difficulties.

On the one hand, the DES reluctant (and still is, as policy) to agree that more per cent of teacher training trants have the qualificatio take an honours degree cour the other, CNAA had no that, though they would, be pared to listen to argumen favour of a 2+2 structure, would not even consider a 2+1 Ordinary BEd in which educ and professional training sented only one-third of the co

Fortunately, the DES relen the extent of allowing the to recruit for the four year ours course only and CNAA accepted the submission, what we are now doing. fortunately, the college had ficulty in attracting sufficient year and one year post-grad students to meet its target last year and, against the pattern, is doing so again for

What we hope now is that who write and influence opinio such matters, and particularly who have condemned the argued in favour of the univers degree plus the one year graduate course, will think

It seems ironic that after of complaint about the inadequ and, particularly the shortne the one year post-graduate (most significantly from those ing it), it is now being seen way forward. If 3+1 could it not be argued that infinitely better?

"Animal Land where there are No People is quite near, only you can't see it. It is a kind of Garden Cage, with the North Pole and the sea always roughling and wavy."

Sybil Corbet was six years old when, in 1897, she described the habitat of her illustrated bestiary. Accessible at any age, Animal Land is an inspiration to the artist and a gift to the storyteller. Every inhabitant carries an imaginative charge, a rich potentiality of character drawn from myth, poetry and observation. Every species bears fruit after its kind—or ours, according to the predominance of natural history or anthropomorphism in the disposition of the writer.

Animals serve to pin down and differentiate our perceptions of human personality, condensing that cloud of impressions that is "almost in the shape of a camel . . . backed like a weasel . . . and very like a whale". Identify your fauna, assemble your party and the narrative almost launches itself. Think of an eagle. Predatory beak and claws, penetrating eyes and majestic wingspan suggest, in form and function, an aristocratic arrogance, an imperious power that might, in fantasy, sustain a man's weight and fulfil the dream of flight. The eagle usually appears as a snob but acts as a saviour.

On the other hand, think of a pigeon and your ready-made character is a gregarious city-dweller and reconnaissance expert, resourceful in action, repetitive in speech.

The navigational skills of birds, imperfectly grasped by science but emblematic of the soul, have steered plots and lent significance to stories since Genesis. Writers who invoke Animal Land draw upon the stored energy of long tradition. These new specimens of the genre combine the themes we associate with the first Ark—error, rescue, regeneration, the search for a home—with the current preoccupations of the Human Zoo—mass communications, gang warfare and the search for identity.

Penelope Lively is best known for her fictional studies of time-travelling. Her novels reveal a historian's fascination with survivals of the past, ancient relics, pathways, and rituals. In Going Back she compared persistent memories with vestigal land-marks in a submerged terrain: "You are left with islands in a confused and layered landscape, like the random protrusions after a heavy snowfall, the telegraph pole and hump of farm machinery and buried wall". Her latest book expands this metaphor by going forward to a post-diluvian future, in which six animals explore what is left of England after the human population has vanished.

Travelling from Carlisle to London in the hope of discovering Stanley's identity, they investigate and interpret the ruins of twentieth-century civilization, fending off attacks by marauding dogs, sinister crows and bureaucratic monkeys. The narrator is the mongrel, Pal, whose decency, good nature and common-sense are shared by Freda the cow and Ned the horse. All three express themselves in comfortable cliches, exclaiming in art galleries, "Well, I'm blowed! What's all this in aid of, then?" and reiterating placidly, "It stands to reason", by way of confirming Shaw's axiom that all progress depends on the unreasonable individual.

Manic-depressive Stanley inquires and innovates, rediscovers music and re-invents the wheel, while indulging in the sort of tantrums and exhibitionism that get intellectuals a bad name. Friendship and loyalty notwithstanding, an evolutionary microcosm in which the bumptiously gifted lead the complacently philistine offers small hope for the future and makes for very predictable fiction. Despite the vivacity of the thrills and spills, and the charm of Harold Jones's compositions, I was not sorry to part company with the crew, who, following the dénouement, journey on indefinitely.

Why should an original idea in distinguished hands prove less than satisfying? There are several arresting images, notably the deserted department store from which you can help yourself, that recurring fictional treasure trove of the post-neutron era. But generally one misses intensity in the scenes and artefacts of the drowned world. It's just one darned thing after another, an inventory of junk. Stanley's tools and techniques are perfunctorily described, either because tinkering with gadgets has little appeal for the author or because she is restricted to the impoverished vernacular of honest Pal.

Idiosyncratic diction is enough to denote character in the supporting cast—ecclesiastical pigeon, condescending eagle, military parrot, narcissistic cat—but the chief protagonists remain equally flat and schematic, lacking even an awareness of their own past. This is consistent with the logic of the book. Animal memories are short and moreover confused by Stanley's mythmaking eloquence. Amnesia offers a challenge to the author, a dimension of mystery, an ironical twist. In this experiment, I'm afraid it comes across as a blank.

Popular authors are sometimes driven to undue fecundity and premature production by persuasive editors, clamorous children or importunate bank managers. So it's good to hear of a long creative life, full of acclaim and free from deadlines. Ben Lucien Burman has recently completed his twentieth book in his eightieth year, and there seems every chance that the entertaining Catfish Bend sagas will flow benignly on into his second century. The neatly trailing line of his wife's Thurberesque drawings suits the homespun wisdom of his inconsequential chat.

Our expectations of Animal Land are reversed here with vegetarian carnivores, a homing pigeon who has lost his sense of direction, and a left-handed rattle-snake whose ferocity is all bluff. Doctors, evangelists, detectives, property developers and Texan benefactors are all gently sent up. The corny story—misguided trek to false paradise followed by return to home, sweet home—is enlivened by scenic surprises: big white clouds "that look as if somebody'd torn open some bales of cotton" and cypresses growing in swamps "with gnarled knees like hundred year old elephants".

By contrast, a drainpipe in the Times Square subway station is the setting for George Selden's third book about Harry Cat and Tucker Mouse. They adopt an abandoned puppy who has "a New York problem"—an attachment to the city and nowhere to go. Briefly initiated into a gang of strays, Huppy seeks the help of a vulgar pigeon and a refined Siamese who enable him to win the affection of a respectable piano-playing owner-occupier. "It always feels like a miracle when somebody's found a home in New York", sighs Harry, and the gutters and alleys of convincing urban squalor overflow with compensatory schmaltz. Huppy lisps baby-talk, peeps meltingly out from under floppy ears, tugs at our heart-strings with his fluffy paws, until, in a culminating piece of chutzpah, he becomes a symbol of manhood. The pianist is derided for his sentimental fondness for his cat. "Yick! Sick-making! That's one guy who really needs a dog." Tenderness and astringency are both evident in the delightful line drawings of Garth Williams who deserves the tribute he received from Margaret Blount: "the Rembrandt of animal portraiture."

Crowds loom in the background of this story, with its mouse-eye view of commuters, the crazy jumble which somehow formed itself into a pattern of trampling legs. In The Invincible Mr Az. however, it is the animals who are the extras. On a luxury yacht, "parrots screeched. A lynx howled. Monkeys shrieked. A leopard roared. Others bellowed, whined, quacked or screamed"—but it's only noises off, a rumble of vocabulary, to display the mesmeric powers of the eponymous villain.

A circus-owner with conservationist ideals, he succumbs to a dream of world conquest, having been corrupted by a sinister scientist and a blow on the head—a certain abruptness is characteristic of the plot. The ensuing exploits involving a super-dog with miniaturized transmitter concealed in its collar, two kidnapped children, buried treasure in a maze, a pitched battle in a safari park and a shipwreck organized by whales, evoke gasps of horror from Alexandra the acrobat and a low shocked whistle from Oscar, her fiancé, who is the heir to an earldom and nephew of the Prime Minister.

The author has had great success with his Flying Doctor television series and it may be that the dramatic effects he intends with his crudely hyperbolic prose could be spectacularly achieved on film. The ghost of the Abbess who haunts the stately home in dismembered portions seems a good telegenic idea; and Alexandra's "neat supple figure which showed to perfection in plain working costume and tights" would doubtless look better on the screen than on the page.

Sustaining the impact of Mr Az's stunning feats is a strain. The author seems to fear that words may fail him as he pulls out all the stops: "What next?" repeated Mr Az, his eyes full of the swirling blue of crazed dream. "Ah! Haha!"

In his frenetic struggle to update the Ark, the ecological mastermind is indeed likely to be overtaken by events. Seas depleted of fish and bees prevented from swarming are already with us. But Michael Noonan protests too much and tries too hard, pepping up the miracles of nature and so breaking the spell of the perennial theme: "And the fear of you and the dread of you shall be upon every beast of the earth and upon every fowl of the air, upon all that moveth upon the earth and upon all the fishes of the sea. Into your hand are they delivered."

Sebastian the grasshopper learns a hard lesson: the grass is not always greener in another pair of wings. He tries being, among other insects, a butterfly, a ladybird and a bee and eventually learns to enjoy life as himself. Here some ants are making a violin to cheer him up. A moral tale, charmingly illustrated. ("Sebastian Grasshopper" by Rosanne McConachie. Dent £2.95)

Adolescent love, that alarming infection, has in our imaginations a great deal in common with magic, above all in its unpredictability; it also has a certain mysterious kinship with death, perhaps only because the hitherto secure youngster, for whom these two words have tended to have no real meaning, often gets hit by an awareness of mortality and a first passion more or less simultaneously. So in each of these novels for the just post-pubertal reader, mysteries of love and death interpenetrate, and so do different time or dimensions.

Lee Harding uses the familiar parallel-universe theory of science-fiction in two ways in his ambitious novel, The Weeping Sky. The world he depicts is evidently one parallel to ours, in which a dominant Church whose symbol is the Wheel takes its orders from Athens and persecuted Galileo for developing a parallel-universe theory. But the solution to the apparent miracle of the wall of water hanging in the sky, investigated by young Conrad of the heretical College of Scientists, also depends on the theory. Mr Harding is inventive, and his apocalyptic vision of a new flood is impressive, but the book suffers badly from his apparent attempt to write in a style reminiscent of Scott; this becomes particularly distracting in conversation, when a mixture of Wardour Street tushery and modern colloquialism jars badly. There are a few rather impressive illustrations.

Here is a fully worked-out, and highly romantic, love story. In The Rain Woman, by Charlotte Morrow, 15-year-old Jenny never gets us far as really being in love with Llew, the arrogant circus boy whose arrival in her village is the first disturbance to a centreless life spent skiving off school and keeping house for her father after her mother has left them. Much more troubling is the effect on her of the woman who calls herself Bryn and may be a witch; much more rewarding her friendship with a young archaeologist who helps her to overcome her reading block. Charlotte Morrow packs a great deal into a short novel; practical, emotional, spiritual problems jostle, and turn out to be facets of each other. When Jenny learns to respect herself, she can do what ever she needs to do: really care for her father, learn to read, defy Bryn's magic, make it rain, sacrifice her own desire for the ancient bowl, and get her mother back. Perhaps there is too much, so that nothing is quite given its full weight, but the picture of a girl breaking out of the prison of a self-imposed stupidity, and the sense of place and weather are very well done.

Christopher Leach's narrator heroine, a couple of years older than Jenny, also has problems in knowing what to do with her life when her parents take up work as organizing caretakers of a stately home, but Rosalinda is a straightforward ghost story, and Anne is soon in danger of having no life of her own, or even no life at all, when the spirit of wilful Rosalinda Warrender, who had died mysteriously when her artist lover was murdered in 1786, tries to take possession of her. I found the details of settling into the great house, and Anne's developing feelings about the country, about things, about her selfhood, more interesting than the interminable attempts of Rosalinda to force her to relieve her own passions and death, though these are the experiences through which Anne eventually defines herself.

But then I am a grimly unconvincible sceptic where ghost stories are concerned; I find it much easier to suspend disbelief for the duration of The Love Genie and accept a gorgeous young man, with almost unlimited powers, locked in an ammonite. When Jennie releases him, he provides her with unlimited milk chocolate, eyeshadow, and assurance about her budding attractiveness, since she reminds him of the beautiful saint who had imprisoned him in the ammonite because he pursued her too ardently. One reason for his acceptability is the comic matter-of-factness of Joanne Webster's narrative tone, and her shrewd awareness of both the knowingness and the innocence of many 14 year olds today. Some adults may be appalled that Jennie is so boy-obsessed at 14, and some cynically surprised that the progress of her romance with sixth-former Simon is so slow, but I feel Joanne Webster has it just about right. There are some splendidly absurd moments, as when the genie takes seriously Jennie's wish for more bosom, and a satisfyingly moral though not oppressively pious, ending. It takes a frivolous approach to love and magic by comparison with the other three, but it is enormous fun.

A Swag of Stories. Collected by Leon Garfield.
Ward Lock £2.95. 7063 5587 3.

Tough Australian humour and picturesque bluntness loom large in Leon Garfield's welcome new collection. He has added one of his own to the ten by native Australian writers and they all, as he rightly claims, "include childhood's world"—though at least three may well be above the heads of younger readers. "Giovanni Paolo's Land", for example, calls for extraordinary powers of visual imagination (not to mention some familiarity with the legal niceties of deeds and property conveyancing) in order to reconstruct all the minute detail of terrain and flora. Then again there's "First Love Till Midnight", in which a roving pilot hungers for a renewed encounter with a pretty girl he has once briefly met on a stopover. Despite excessive indulgence in luxuriant metaphor it's a magnificent little cameo and very Antoine de Saint-Exupéry. And thirdly, the most distinguished contribution in the book by that most distinguished writer, Ivan Southall. This is a serious and a touch cynical account of the recovery of a rocket, suggesting, among other thought-provoking ideas, that "the human brain, applied with specialization to a problem, can sometimes leave the computers gasping."

The remaining eight stories, from the child's point of view, are all winners, though they were not, says Mr Garfield, written especially for him. The Brighton-born compiler himself has a characteristic contribution about a Dublin-born ghost-pickpocket (another of Garfield's rogues making his living by quickness of hand and wit) doing his stuff in Adelaide, Australia. But my favourite is "The Vietnamese Baby"—a real cliff-hanger—about the rescue of the eponymous infant from the talons of the wedge-tailed eagle, Australia's most deadly bird of prey, by the use of a cat as decoy. The deadpan narration conceals great warmth and human sympathy and is guaranteed to elicit a kindred response from the youthful reader.

David Self on historical novels

Hobberdy Dick. By K. M. Briggs.
Kestrel £2.95. 7226 5315 8.
Johnny Head-in-Air. By Frederick Grice.
Oxford University Press £2.50. 19 271423 6.
In the Time of the Bells. By Maria Gripe.
Chatto and Windus £3.50. 7011 2294 3.
The Nine Bronze Tripods. By Norma Martyn.
Cassell £2.50. 7269 5453 5.

The historical novel is, traditionally, a somewhat romantic affair in which extrovert heroes indulge in a good deal of thigh slapping and swashbuckling as they charge along the highways of history, accompanied by trusty companions, their true love and a faithful horse or dog. This particular quartet of novels, however, all celebrate introspection, loneliness and solitude.

The opening quotation in Maria Gripe's In the Time of the Bells tells us firmly (in Pericles's words), "You can trust the individual. Leave him in peace!" This dark novel is a powerful and moving study of adolescent introversion and also a plea that such people should not be dragged out of themselves.

Translated from the Swedish, it is set in the middle ages in a Scandinavian country. The young hero is King Arvid. He is 16 and has never been allowed to be himself. As prince he was regarded only as the future king, and as king he is forced continuously to play a role. He becomes withdrawn and wilful and so a whipping boy is engaged to accept his punishment (the king himself must remain inviolate) and a princess is brought to be his queen. But Arvid remains isolated and the whipping boy and princess fall in love. Their discreet affair seems doomed to be as tragic as the king's life, but, by relying on his intuition and preserving his independence, Arvid brings about a happy resolution and discovers his true identity.

It is not an easy or a cheerful novel. In almost every sense it is a picture of a Dark Age (as any good historical novel should do) it effectively conveys the atmosphere of the period in which it is set, and it will also speak directly and reassuringly to those readers in their mid-teens who are jealous of their emotional privacy. It does not portray gregariousness as a desirable virtue, but values the peace of solitude and the dignity of the individual.

Johnny Head-in-Air is another study of a lonely boy's single-minded dedication to what matters most to him. Set in a large country house between the wars, it is about a prep school boy who finds and determines to restore a man-powered flying machine. Enlisting the help of an old handyman, he nearly achieves his aim—he is thwarted only by the intervention of a neighbour who knows the history of the machine and who fears the Icarus myth will be enacted once again. (In fact, years later, it almost is when the central character is in the RAF and is forced to bale out over the Western Desert.)

This is a short book (only 76 pages) and reads as much like a personal memoir as fiction. For this, and for its effectiveness in evoking a certain life-style and for the clarity of its prose, it deserves a much wider audience than it might seem destined to achieve.

So, too, does The Nine Bronze Tripods. Precisely because its author, Norma Martyn (the distinguished Australian writer), has so accurately captured the inscrutable ambiguity of Chinese legend, it promises to be a hard "read". As the young heroine says: "If I must use cunning to escape the slave market, then I will use cunning . . . but as I would not wish to then become a slave to cunning, what must I do?" The answer is to find the nine bronze tripods which contain all the answers—including the answer to the question, "Where are the nine bronze tripods?"

Not so much a novel, more a succession of interwoven stories, it does, however, develop a strong narrative thread as Tao Ling, the heroine, makes her solitary journey through doubt and fear towards joy and confidence and, eventually, love. Set in China in the legendary (rather than historical) past, it is a gentle introduction to an alien culture and it is a pity that, because of its romantic ending, it might run the danger of being labelled simply "a book for girls". Tao Ling is no wilting wallflower but a determined representative of the People.

It is pleasing to note the re-publication of K. M. Briggs' Hobberdy Dick, another celebration of the non-conforming individual. This is a compulsive, gossipy story of England in the Commonwealth and of an upstart, urban Puritan family coming to terms with country ways—thwarted by the witches and protected by the hobgoblins and will o' the wisps which do, of course, populate our copses, hedgerows and churchyards.

All of these poems were written, or collected with the young, or very young, in mind. Over and Over Again compiled by poet Barbara Ireson and songwriter Christopher Rowe, is a bumper anthology of poems and songs for the very young—I had difficulty keeping it out of my seven-year-old son's hands long enough to review it. The majority of the poems are traditional nursery rhymes, tongue twisters, etc, but there are original pieces by the editors. The good thing about the collection (apart from its price) is that it has obviously been composed with its consumers in mind; all the words and lyrics could be managed by children gaining reading confidence, and, since all the songs have a melody line and guitar arrangement, any parent who can strum or hum can participate in making the words live. Many of the pieces are suited to mime and movement and the collection is boldly illustrated in cartoon-style.

William Cole admits to writing "silly verse": I wonder what the critical criteria are for such stuff—the sillier the better? Certainly his verse isn't half as loony as Spike Milligan's or John Lennon's, but would still be enjoyable, particularly if read aloud in silly voices. Luckily the essential sanity of the poems (perhaps you need to be "touched" to write good silly verse) is undermined by the superb illustrations by George MacClain. Finely etched in black and white, reminiscent of Sendak and Mervyn Peake, they generate the manic broodiness lacking in the verse.

Strolling Players is one of a series of thematic poetry anthologies from Evans Brothers and concentrates on clowns, minstrels, actors, jugglers and dancers. One thing this anthology seems to prove is that a thematic collection needs more than just a theme to hold it together. The editors must have exhausted the supply of "circus" poetry and the result, in terms of style, quality and theme, is a bit of a magpie's nest—and at the price, that's an expensive nest.

There are many excellent pieces here by writers such as MacNiell, Conn, Abse, Kipling and Sandburg, obviously proving the enduring magic of the circus and theatre, for writers and readers alike, but the same places can also be the home of the sentimental and melodramatic resulting in lines such as:

"dance and be gay as a fawn or a fay".

If you need a poem on a clown in a hurry, or want to do some project work, one copy in the library would be plenty.

Much of children's literature is too good for children—thank goodness—and often seems to appeal to the child in the adult rather than the child in the child. One More Makes Four is a collection of indifferent verses and quite amazingly original pictures. To be fair, the pictures came first, so the words are little more than a gloss on them. Each picture presents an animal in an incongruous situation—an owl on a large bowl of tomatoes, a beaver, glimpsed between shifting curtains, sucking at a baby's bottle, a group of pole cats tensed in an empty room.

The images hit you like moments from a dream—a dream whose significance you can't quite place. They are painted with lovely subtle colouring, draughtsman-like precision and a challenging, surrealist sense of form. Who cares if the kids don't like them?

Hal Summers is well known in many anthologies, but Tomorrow is My Love is his first collection specifically for the young. Where does adolescence begin and end? At what age does poetry start growing up? These are shifting questions with shifting answers, but I can imagine that Hal Summers's work here would appeal to young readers beginning to put away childish things. He writes with a relaxed, casual air in regular and traditional forms, about the stars, fields, the seasons, and most of all, about time and its human meanings. There's a touch of Edward Thomas in his sensibility as in "Speak Your Sorrows", expressing not a childish but a mature melancholy and his images have a capacity to surprise when you least expect it, as in "Catalonia", where "the sun rides into ambush over the brigand hill".

One of Diana Bloomfield's wood-engravings which adorn a beautiful new edition of Walter de la Mare's "Come Hither" anthology for young readers (Kestrel. Two volumes, £4.50 each). First published in 1923, it is still a delightful introduction to some of the best in English poetry.

The Dream Thing. By Judy Allen.
Hamish Hamilton £3.25. 0 241 89836 6.
The Eggchild. By Lorna Baxter.
Faber and Faber £3.50. 0 571 11205 6.
Tales from Barleymill. By Elisabeth Russell Taylor.
Abelard-Schuman £2.25. 0 200 72556 4. 60p. 0 200 72557 2.

Judy Allen's The Dream Thing illustrates the impossibility of dividing children's novels into mutually exclusive categories of fantasy and realism. The Dream Thing deals with one-parent families, prejudice against gypsies, bullying, teenage love-traumas, urban wasteland and all the fashionable paraphernalia of the "realistic" novel, but transforms this material through its central symbol, the "dream thing" which the confused and frightened Jen summons into existence. Jen is illegitimate, half-gypsy, and full of the peculiar self-absorbtion and suppressed hysteria of adolescence. Taunted at school about her gypsy blood she finds a focus for her hate and fear in the gypsy encampment which appears beside the flyover. Slowly she dreams a monster into being, which haunts both her own nights and those of the gypsy children; by day she schemes to get them evicted.

"The thing that matters most to me is hate" Jen writes in an essay, and means it, yet she remains a sympathetic and likeable character, even though her actions are motivated almost entirely by spite. Her sense of persecution and the claustrophobic intensity of her emotions are precisely conveyed, and prove Judy Allen a writer of subtlety and vigour.

If Jen's "powers" are nebulous, Jasper Sard's, in The Eggchild, are not. The Sards have power over metal and stone, just as Sol controls the sun, Princess Diana the moon, and the Moschatels the planets. Magic is a way of life for the Four Families, whose children, led by Jasper, combine their powers, repel invaders, and discover the Windhover family, whose power over wild animals complements their own.

Lorna Baxter provides little detail about her imaginary country, nor even a name, but it is convincing enough, and the relationships between children and adults are developed with a wry humour. There are occasional flaws: many children will surely know, for instance, that horses need encouragement to leave a burning stable, and the babytalk of the shape-changing toddler Shrimp becomes wearisome. However, the search for the identities of the mysterious Hawk, Nutmeg and Shrimp, and for the meaning of the eggchild itself, a strange, singing, golden creature, half egg, half baby, which holds the key to all the families' problems, casts a glamour over such faults, and the Doppelganger link between Hawk and the evil enchanter provides a frisson which makes this gentle fantasy memorable.

The four supernatural stories in Tales from Barleymill break all the rules of fantasy writing, and are not strong enough to survive it. They mix every sort of magic without rhyme, rule or reason, and consistently strike notes which are either coy, patronising or whimsical. "Jude", for instance, is simply a sentimentalized version of The Secret Garden; in "Tulipina" fluttery elves leave their babies in tulips.

All three of these books could be called fantasies, but they really have very little in common: The Dream Thing depends for its success on convincing us that its picture of everyday reality is a true one, for only if we accept Jen's world as a valid picture of ours can the dream thing hold any power as a metaphor for the destructive power of adolescent emotions; The Eggchild emphasizes the positive value of those same emotions, but finds it easier to do so in an invented world, where children can have magic powers, and save countries; Tales from Barleymill falls uneasily between the two, half trying to convince us that its stories are true and half that they are legend.

Wild Ghost Chase. By D. J. Enright.
Chatto and Windus £2.95. 7011 2285 4.
The Castle of the Winds. By Maureen Osborne.
Heinemann £3.10. 434 95581 7.
Creepies. Selected by Helen Hoke, illustrations by Bill Prosser
Franklin Watts £3.95. 85166 656 6.

Shrieking, shrewd or shrouded in mist—they come in all disguises. No matter where your fancy lies, the deathless prose of the spook writer's trade appears to cater for every taste. Personally, I prefer my ghosts to have a sense of humour and D. J. Enright's Wild Ghost Chase goes a long way towards filling the bill. Mr Enright serves up quizzical poltergeists, spirits of television sets, evermore chanting dendly commercials, a watersprite who wants a soul and a lank vegetarian vampire.

The waggish tone, where allusions to Middlemarch, Keats and King Lear all jockey for position, is buoyed up by a passion for appalling puns and verbal skulduggery of a literary kind. A tendency toward endless diversions means that it is not always clear whether brief, witty sketches or a badly constructed spoof is the guiding spirit. But all the same it is a curiously original way to send up Hammer films. Mr Enright is always entertaining even—or especially—when right off the point.

Rather more sinister and lost in a swirling Celtic mist is Maureen Osborne's The Castle of the Winds—a tale which bears the hallmarks of the Great Ghost Tradition.

Two children far away from home, in a strange old house on the border of Wales; a strange old housekeeper; a strange old farmhand; strange sounds in the night and strange dreams in your sleep. The gothic machinery creaks very audibly—we even get the Welsh equivalent of "Don't 'ee go down there, Jim lad." And the climax makes you throw up your hands in critical horror and disbelief as the hero is suddenly tied to a rock as a sacrifice by an army of Druids.

But where the melodrama is uneven in tone, a whimsical flavour of romance provides a welcome antidote. There are some peculiarly haunting passages, where Edmund the boy finds his long dead brother (a twin, identical and lost at birth) whose relationship with the living twin is as beautiful and illusory as the notion of the dying locked in the ranks of the "Undead".

For those who fancy a nasty shiver, Helen Hoke's Creepies will certainly provide gratifyingly sleepless nights. Notably uneven in the quality of writing, this selection ranges from beastly murder by a Martian-based corpse who refuses to die (crashingly superficial horror-tale jumble) to the witty notion of a room insulated against the passing of time (Eric Ambrose's "Carlton's Father"). Classic horror movie material includes Bram Stoker's "The Judge's House", where all the machinery clatters along in true old fashioned style. There's a gruesome tale about a Natterjack toad, poisonous plants and cruel creepers. "I found the creeper hammering at the conservatory panes." Who needs originality anyway?

The line between spine-chilling fable and gratuitous obscenity is finally crossed in William Hope Hodgson's "Voice in the Night" which deals with insidious leper-like growth. But for those who find titillation in decaying corpses and putrescent flesh, this collection leaves little to be desired—and even less to the imagination.

Virginia Makins on picture books

Robert Crowther's The Most Amazing Hide-and-Seek Alphabet Book (Kestrel, £2.95) is everything that most elaborately designed modern children's books are not. It is clear and funny and makes compulsive reading (or playing: it is very hard to decide whether pop-ups are books or toys) and it fascinates all ages from the under-twos upwards—not just the adults.

Bold black plain lower case letters open (by a variety of tabs and turns) to reveal animals—an ape swings down from the "a", a frog jumps up from the "f", a tiny mouse scuttles across the "m"; an owl peers out of the "o", then goes back to sleep. The words—owl, frog, etc—also appear.

It looks very destructible—but it seems that children love it so much they are prepared to be careful: the only casualty after a month's daily reading of one copy by several two to five-year-olds is that the elephant has lost its trunk.

It is cheering to find such an entertaining product among the ruck of alphabets and counting books that are pouring off the stocks, no doubt as a result of the Great Debate. Alphabet by Ljiljana Rylands (Evans £2.25, Dinosaur 55p) is a bit more interesting than some, in that characters that appear for one letter wander on through the book.

Ladybirds have not only rejigged (and improved) their abc and counting books. They have added colours, shapes, and telling the time to their pre-school list (all 30p). The abc is as good as most conventional ones; so is the time book.

The shapes are unnecessarily simplified—young children learning hundreds of new names and ideas a week can manage spheres and cubes as well as circles and squares, and it is simply wrong to tell them that bubbles and oranges are circles. (Just as it is unnecessarily confusing for them, as Dr Margaret Donaldson's recent book, Children's Minds, shows, to teach them that the letter "a" sounds as in apple without mentioning that it also appears as in ape.)

All these books, however well-intentioned and liked by children (and they do like Ladybird's bold everyday pictures) should carry a Government health warning: "Frequent questioning of young children about the number, shape or colour of objects can damage their interest in education."

Back at the more sophisticated didactic level, Rodney Peppé manages to combine clever design with the three Rs in a way that appeals to both children and adults. Humphrey the Number Horse (Methuen £2.50) is an enjoyable number book that mercifully goes beyond straight counting into tables, and seems—both because of this complexity and because of the delightful fingerprint animals that are fun to count—to please children at various pre-school and primary levels.

The Bear's Counting Book, by Robin and Jocelyn Wild, is another attempt to make a counting book more interesting, by incorporating the numbers into a story about three bears turning a house upside down (Goldilocks in reverse). Neither the story nor the way numbers are dealt with is outstandingly interesting, but it's an engaging book for beginning readers, with a nice clear text and big bold numerals and number words. The pictures are lively and fun.

Finally, An Invitation to the Butterfly Ball, a counting rhyme by Jane Yolen with pictures by Jane Breskin Salben (World's Work, £3.10) suffers from the faults of many modern elaborately designed children's book. The pictures are absolutely charming—for adults: they are pastiches of Sheperd, Beatrix Potter, Rackham, Doré and no doubt others.

The text is archaic without being particularly distinguished: a rather boring version of what is probably an old number rhyme. No doubt some children would like it: it is, as they used to say, sweetly pretty.

Zoo story

Golden Bats and Pink Pigeons. By Gerald Durrell.
Collins £3.50. 00 211576 X.

The Dodo was exterminated by man and the followers he wittingly or unwittingly brings with him—dogs, cats, rats, mice and attendant vermin. All over the world other scarce species are in danger of being destroyed in the same way. In 1959 Gerald Durrell founded the Jersey Wildlife Preservation Trust to try to prevent further extinction by breeding endangered species in captivity.

Les Augres is not an orthodox "zoo". It is a sanctuary for all threatened species, a sanctuary where breeding groups are established and built up into colonies. Once these colonies are firmly established, surplus specimens are taken back to their natural habitat so that they can repopulate it.

In Golden Bats and Pink Pigeons Gerald Durrell explains that, although he and his assistants have had great success in breeding these scarce species in Jersey, the species should really be bred in their countries of origin. To help to do this, the Jersey Wildlife Preservation Trust has set up a scholarship scheme to train foreign students to start captive breeding programmes.

As the Dodo is the symbol of the Trust and as Mauritius was the home of the ill-fated bird, it seemed only fitting that the first scholarship student should come from that lovely island in the Indian Ocean. So Gerald Durrell went there to discuss it with the Mauritian government and, at the same time, to find other endangered species.

This book is the record of two visits that Durrell, his assistant John Hartley and his secretary Ann Peters made to "the enchanting island" and its neighbour Round Island, also the Island of Rodrigues, 350 miles away.

Durrell's account of their search for the rare Mauritian pink pigeon, the lizards known as Telfair's skinks and Gunther's geckos, and the golden bats of Rodrigues is lively and entertaining. One of the most diverting incidents is how they captured a good selection of bats in a thunderstorm, helped by native assistants, one of whom sported a T-shirt on which was emblazoned "I dig President Kennedy".

The book closes with an appeal for readers to help the Trust. It is an excellent cause, and I hope this appeal will bear fruit more substantial and edifying than the evil-smelling Jak Fruit they were forced to use to entice the bats.

Charles Hannam on wartime memoirs

Mischling, Second Degree: My Childhood in Nazi Germany. By Ilse Koehn.
Hamish Hamilton £3.50. 241 89861 7.

The insane Nazi racial theories led to legislation that was intended to preserve the purity of the race. Anyone who had Aryan and Jewish grandparents was a "Mischling", a mixture. Ilse Koehn's father's mother was Jewish and that made him a Mischling, first degree, and Ilse therefore became a Mischling, second degree.

Just one Jewish grandmother; but that was dangerous enough. Her mother was forced to divorce her father and spent some time in a mental hospital with a nervous breakdown. Ilse was brought up by her grandparents and no one dared to tell her of her "mixed background" until she was 15 years old. Her family were Social Democrats, hated the Nazis but were powerless to do much more than grumble when they were among themselves, and they conformed to the over-increasing pressures of the war. Her father only survived because he was a skilled electrician and was able to mend very high-power cables cut during bombing raids.

This is a moving document written with almost complete recall, often more effective because events which had little meaning to her at the time are recorded with genuine honesty and without the wisdom of hindsight. The memories are translated from German into English without too much attention to English idiom so that occasionally I thought I was reading the book in German. "She has raisins in her head" means "she has ideas above her station" in English. This may have been deliberate policy on the part of the editors to preserve the German flavour but it may confuse a reader without German.

What emerges clearly is that young Germans were not treated very well, even those who belonged to the Hitler Youth and tried to conform, like Ilse. She and the other girls from her school were herded from camp to camp. She hated the dull work they had to do but they were watched, nagged and reported on by a very nasty set of Nazi supervisors. About the only act of rebellion for her was to mutter "Scheisse" (shit) under her breath.

The main events of the war provide a structure to the narrative. Her Jewish grandmother was transported to Theresienstadt camp at the age of 84. Ilse Koehn here tells what she learnt from her father who went with his old mother to the railway station in Berlin. He was crying but she said, "At eighty-four, Ernst, I have lived my life." The guards tried to push her into the truck but she demanded and got a chair and so was able to climb into the truck unaided. This is the heroism of ordinary people so often unrecorded. When Hitler survived the assassination attempt in 1944 a friend just dared to whisper, "pity", but she said it so quietly that Ilse was not even sure whether it had been said or not. This is what terror is really like.

The chaos and the agony of the bombing at the end of the war is described graphically. Then they suffered "liberation" from the Russians and had to spend days under floorboards to escape being raped. There are happier moments: a pig had been fattened and when the time came to have it slaughtered, there were friends from everywhere and they queued up with buckets for the blood. Ilse had helped to feed the pig, loved it it and could not eat a mouthful. In the end the family was reunited—an unusually happy ending for that time.

This is another piece in the mosaic, the story of ordinary people who just had to survive somehow. The horrors of war are mostly implied rather than stated explicitly; this important document will be read and appreciated by people over the age of 13.

Teachers are often surprised by the quality and depth of their pupils' memories and observation, and recognise that the best time to learn is when everything is new and therefore important to children. Here is a series of five books designed to help teachers to amuse, interest and at the same time to teach. Shapes, Colours and the Ladybird a b c each have their part to play in bringing the child to an early understanding of the reading process; Counting teaches him to recognise and understand the simple use of numbers, and Telling the time shows him how to relate the time on a clock face to his everyday life.

This recent batch of short stories for the very young includes the first publication in English of stories ba Dutch-State-Prize-winner (Paul Biegel), a thematic collection of Alison Uttley stories, James Reeves's extension of his territory into the very short story for the very young, new original stories by Joan Aiken, and what might well be the first psychological comedy for infants.

Tale of a One-Way Street, by Joan Aiken, is the third volume produced in collaboration with Jan Pienkowski. This time the eight stories are original. They have the same direct appeal that characterised the European folk-tales retold in The Kingdom Under the Sea, but they alsn have an added spice of humour derived from the incongruity of fantasy in a fairly seedy modern setting.

Such amiable fantasy-figures, for instance, as the post man with a walkie-talkie, reporting back gossip to the sorters; the man in a wheelchair who, through his canary interpreter, discusses with four stone lions the problem of rubbish-dumps; the pop-song promoter trying to buy magic goodbye-songs; or the old man who lives in a thatched cottage on the top of a 50-storey block of flats.

These are happy stories to read, since many of them have a kind of mild allegory built into them, largely through the behaviour of the characters: Tom Mann, who refuses to accept that everything must travel one-way in a one-way street or Tansy, the digger's daughter, who loses one fantasy moon but finds the faith to believe in another. But what makes these stories important is the manner of their telling, which is excellent

A child can hardly read Miss Aiken's stories—or look at Jan Pienkowski's pictures—without feeling, at least for a time, that fuss-pottery is dead. And don't we all need that release?

The New Red Bike, by Simon Watson, also employs a modern setting, this time a realistic one, seen through the eyes of a questing preschooler. The cover and format of The New Red Bike give this collection a rather old-fashioned look, but the 16 stories themselves present a splendidly droll view of infant psychology. The following extract from the title story is typical of the non-sequitur of things as Wallace, the innocent hero, experiences them:

> "I rode all around the park", Wallace told Grandma when they got back.
> "Well done", said Grandma.
> "And you didn't fall off at all?"
> "Yes, sometimes", said Wallace. "But I was very brave."
> "Would you like to ride it again tomorrow?" Grandma asked.
> "I don't think so", said Wallace.
> But now that he really could ride it Wallace was allowed to take the bicycle home. He forgot about it, though, when it was in his own garage.

Every one of the stories had three or four gems of narrative or dialogue in which Wallace's comic thought-processes are pithily presented,

Little Peter in The Dwarfs of Nosegay is a somewhat similar character, except that he is a dwarf and lives among birds, bees and rabbits. The 21 stories in this collection can stand by themselves, but together they cover a year in the lives of the dwarfs. Further continuity is achieved through the development of the central character, Little Peter, and the part he plays in the cementing of relationships between the dwarfs, the butterflies and the bees. Paul Biegel is the James Reeves of Holland.

Eggtime Stories, by James Reeves, is a jolly little collection of 10 fable-like stories for four- to seven-year-olds. Each can be read in the time it takes to cook an egg, and there is just sufficient light and zany humour in them to keep the tired child waiting. There are talking animals, giants, and little people here, and some amusing variations on stock situations, such as the Midas-touch and the princess receiving her suitors.

From Spring to Spring is the third selection made by Kathleen Lines of stories by Alison Uttley, the underlying theme of the stories being that of Nature and the changing seasons. Alison Uttley's world is the secure one of Georgian England, with its timid animals and insects, its cottages and Big Houses and fourth gardener's assistants. For late twentieth-century man there's an insidious appeal in the dreamy nostalgia of it all, but one wonders quite what the modern urban 10-year-old will make of it all.

"If only mankind would listen to the talk of the country lanes, they would forget their cares and find that peace of mind which they seem to have lost", murmurs a wise old robin-stroking tramp in one of the tales ("Green Shoes"). Alas, although the robin sings with all his might, a symbolic student nearby takes no notice at all.

There is a strange arbitrary quality about Miss Uttley's imagination which dwells at times on somewhat twee, but sensitive descriptions of (humanized) insect life, but is just as likely to slip into such racy understatement as "She was a dancer at the theatre in the town. He was a poet, but he had written nothing for weeks". But the basis of these tales is not the outmoded dream-morality you might take it to be. When the gypsy takes the shoes to the Lady in the inevitable castle, she immediately instructs her maid to "Tell my Lord I'm off with the gypsies", because "Never in all her dull, short, married life had she felt such happiness!"

Perhaps, in the end, this is why Alison Uttley continues to command a readership. Like the other story-tellers under review here, she is concerned with the unashamed pursuit and presentation of the happiness-factor.

Fun stuff

Things to Make. By Robert Lopshire.
Collins 95p. 00 171168 7.

Part of Dr Seuss "Beginner Books" series, the instructions for these 30 ideas for "fun stuff you can make all by yourself" are designed to encourage a child to read as well as to get down to the suggested activities. The bold and comic illustrations that we've come to link with these books are a practical addition to the written directions, but any child wanting to know what next step to take must actually read the words.

Unfortunately the ideas do not always match the excellent presentation. Most of those based on paper folding are over-simplified and disguise the fact that a fairly delicate skill is needed. If the young reader is not to get too frustrated, an adult will have to be around most of the time—not so much to help out over difficulties as to direct the child's attention to the many straight-forward, and amusing, if sometimes rather old-fashioned (weaving paper mats, growing carrot tops) examples of "fun stuff" that are given here.

Teenage taboos?

Peter Fanning on the horns of a dilemma

Charles Dickens may have invented Childhood, but surely the old man would laugh himself silly to think of the euphemisms currently in vogue for those twentieth-century inventions, adolescence, new adults, young adults, young people, teenagers (although teenagers is almost out of date).

But the twilight world between childhood and maturity—a state to which research hours are devoted by the million, and which signifies nothing to the tribes of West Samoa—is nowhere more blurred and indistinct than in teenage literature. In spite of the mushroom growth of young people's publications, the borderline remains murky and vague. Only recently Brian Glanville wrote explaining to the TLS that, contrary to popular opinion, his novel Target Man was meant for teenagers.

Of Robert Cormier's Chocolate War (Fontana) the TES reviewer declared "It is doubtful and finally irrelevant whether he is writing for adolescents or adults". Irrelevant to Mr Cormier, perhaps, but not much help for the harassed teacher, trying to find suitable material for the Heavy Brigade in 4R. Literature may be a "seamless garment" but, as David Holbrook indicated in The Times (May 30), "a substantial part of our world view comes from a few books of fiction read on the threshold of adolescence".

So, whatever in loco parentis means, it must surely involve definitions and judgments as to what is suitable literature for the children under our care. A book which involves blackmail and fear, implicit references to masturbation and a villain who "felt horny when he roughhoused a kid" is certainly a case for the kid glove treatment.

Barry Hines's The Blinder is another case in point. Here the scenes of sexual intercourse provoked a fair old dust storm round the heads of Penguin. They admit that The Blinder was perhaps a dicey choice for the Peacock Series, but emphasize that it was a deliberate attempt to make people realize the extent of their age range—stretching up to 17 year olds. (The illustration on the cover is misleading, suggesting as it does a kind of standard football fantasy.)

"The trouble is that too many teachers order sets without bothering to read the books." One visualizes stockrooms all over the country bursting at the seams with censored copies of The Blinder. Penguin do add that anyway their books are not published with a view to reading in class. Their Peacock books, of which this is one, aim to bridge the gap between the Puffin and Penguin ranges. Indeed many authors, like Salinger, are published with Penguin in parallel.

For teachers who just cannot cope with the pressure of churning through readers before they go out, Macmillan Topliners specifically mark out the books which they feel the teachers should read. Besides this, Topliners are an educational range—and are much more aware of the Whitehouse Brigade. Teachers' expectations impose definite constraints, as editor Aidan Chambers acknowledges.

"All the same," he adds, "these are hard to assess. At one time teachers might object to explicit sex. Then the mood may change and then harden again." But the publisher's taste and personal judgment is bound to be the decisive factor when a book becomes "Young Person's Category". "We try to ask ourselves what sort of books they read, what sort of things they talk about, what view of the world they take. The characters are generally teenagers, in a plot that will interest a teenager."

But even if you do read the books yourself, the question of suitability is as prickly as a porcupine. The degree of sex and violence may not be the main criterion, but the level of what is reasonable is hardest to define. It is not enough to argue that commercialism everywhere encourages a shallow, superficial view of sex; that anyway young people will obtain their kicks by thumbing through the crumpled sheets of Mayfair and The Sun; or that violence pours like honey from the television set and is often linked with episodes of more than implicit sexuality.

Fashion is no more a moral excuse than so-called realism. So just because children masturbate, should masturbation necessarily be a reading topic for 14-year-olds? Just because they fight, should the gruesome battle in Robert Westall's Machine Gunners sound quite so much as if the author is enjoying himself?

Moreover, should the fact that a book "goes down well" always sway you in its favour? Remember, the most popular book in the age range is Skinhead, a tale full of all that is least acceptable in terms of sensationalism. Highly unfashionable though it may seem, the teacher is faced with the serious role of moral guide and censor. And the brighter the child, the more likely there are to be gaps between emotional and intellectual maturity.

Even so, the censorship game is a minefield, fraught with desperation and despair. Witness, for instance, the charge of "double standards" levelled by NATE at a midland committee. Under strong parental pressure Kes was taken off the syllabus on grounds of "unsuitable content". The book was replaced by To Kill a Mocking Bird—"a tale involving rape, riot, racism and murder". Surely the licentious The Go Between will be the next blue pencil victim, with its "shadows on the wall that opened and closed like an umbrella." And I long for the day when Romeo and Juliet is banned for vulgarities persistent and obscene.

In another corner of the field, as it were, objections to James Bond are passé. But the Ian Fleming syndrome is a lot more pernicious, with its knockabout violence and cocktail sex. The vocabulary is simple, the plot straightforward. Other things being equal, it makes fine second form reading. I have yet to see Fleming on a reading list, but it would not surprise me if somebody tried.

Surely, then, treatment of subject is crucial—far more so than content. S. E. Hinton's gangland violence has an underlying seriousness for all its thrills. Farrukh Dhondy adopts the Barbara Cartland approach (nearly-but-not-quite) in East End at Your Feet. He bridges the gap between bland affection and outright explicitness by concentrating fully on the worries and fears of his heroes and heroines—fears which each one of us can easily identify.

For similar reasons I recommend Hines, Robert Cormier, Westall and Co, despite their sensationalism (but also because of it—and here I am a woodcock to mine own springe). They may not be great literature, but all, to a greater or lesser degree, betray a seriousness in their attitude to the problems faced by adolescents. The impact of these books is not to cheapen but enhance our understanding, even, as in The Chocolate War, when all is dark and drear. I doubt very much whether Harold Robbins clarifies anything at all.

I have deliberately blurred the distinction between class readers and books for private study. Such categories are generally irrelevant and trivial. But teachers will feel that several books, which might cause problems if studied in class, would prove quite acceptable for individual reading.

Finally, there are books where suitability depends on style and quality and a wider definition of content. This is where librarians' tastes and consumer opinion often sharply divide. Quality literature of the past decade groans upon many a library shelf, laden with prizes from eminent boards and studiously avoided by the rabble.

The rehabilitation of heroin addicts, fantasies jewelled with gorgeous imagery, intricate time leaps, grey faced realism—tales which involve every single type of child; these are the literary never-never land of books for young persons, written for adults. This is the other side of the coin from trendy sensationalism. But the very existence of this hybrid genre underlines the crucial need for more consumer research—or in other words teacher and pupil liaison.

Selection may well be a matter of taste, but there can be no selection without knowledge of the market. Time is at a premium. The intellectual stimulus from ploughing through wedges of teenage fiction is not always overwhelming. But how are we to encourage the discriminating reader without a heavy hoeing of the course ourselves?

Strokes of genius

Anne Howarth on tennis

Tennis: A Pictorial History. By Lance Tingay.
Collins £4.95. 00 434553 3.
Tennis Strokes and Strategies.
Hodder and Stoughton £4.95. 340 20722 1.
Mastering Your Tennis Strokes. By Larry Sheehan.
Cassell £4.50. 304 29917 0.

Soon the annual pilgrimage to Wimbledon will begin and devotees of lawn tennis will be once more glued to their television sets. Tennis: a Pictorial History, is an excellent companion for this time of devotion. Tracing the history of the sport from its haphazard beginnings to the present day, the author evokes the atmosphere of those past matches and the colourful personalities who graced the courts.

Those early players were more energetic than one might suppose. In the early 1880s the Renshaw brothers who were outstanding players of their time were already masterly exponents of both the smash and the volley. Similarly, the early years of women's tennis was no mere pat ball. Matches were the best of five sets and players such as Lottie Dod, who at 15 in 1887 was the youngest ever champion of Wimbledon, had a forehand drive that "was a terror to all opponents as were her volleying and smashing". The history is not confined to the wonder of Wimbledon but plots the progress of the game overseas. A full table of results of the championships at Wimbledon, Forest Hills, Paris, Italy and Australia is included at the back of the book.

Tennis is something of a gladiatorial contest and during the past century it has been the personalities of the court that have set the game alight. Lance Tingay describes the reign of the handsome Doherty brothers, the excitement of the incomparable Suzanne Lenglen, the genius of Fred Perry, the dominance of the Australians in the fifties and brings into focus the personalities that are part of the game today.

Written in an informative and captivating style, the book is enhanced by a multitude of photographs and illustrations, recording the many facets of the game.

For those players who wish to improve and emulate the great players of the past the best instruction book is Tennis Strokes and Strategies, compiled from a series that appeared in Tennis Magazine. This is one of those rare instructional books that admits that there are different and equally effective ways of playing strokes. Top professionals with the aid of frame by frame photographs and illustrations of top players in action give their personal opinion about the important features of a particular aspect of each stroke.

There are several writers on the forehand drive on subjects like hitting the power forehand, the importance of the follow through, topspin and even the two-handed forehand. All the strokes are covered from the basic drives through to the half volley and variations on the basic serve. There is a detailed section on tactics or strategies, with diagrams which is full of helpful hints on topics such as the use of the lob and drop shot in game situations and strategies for return of service.

Mastering Your Tennis Strokes also relies on contributions from top professionals. Whereas the previous book was more for the player, this one will be particularly helpful for the beginner. Each stroke is explained in depth and the sections on the common faults in the basic shots and how to cure them are clearly cut out.

Out and about

Stephen Barber

Spotter's Guides
Usborne £1.50 and 65p each.
The Young Naturalist's Handbook. By Leonard Moore
Hamlyn £1.95. 6000 36579 4.

The six books from Usborne are the first in a new series of Spotter's Guides, with Butterflies and Fishes still to come.

Each guide is written by a recognized authority. The Seashore, which collects material from many disciplines, claims 11 consultants and four illustrators—and all this for 64 pages. But in a series like this it is important that the material be well presented, and it has been most carefully planned.

In each book, most of the space is given to illustrations, annotated with identifying features and arrows to salient points. These are arranged in the simplest practical way: in the case of garden flowers it is by colour. At the end are notes on projects, books to read, clubs to join and a scorecard to note what you have seen.

The text is clear and not in the least condescending. Technical terms are used unflinchingly when needed and are properly introduced. Rocks and Minerals is the most demanding: "Cleavage not at right angles gives six-sided rhombs. Calcite is an example." This book offers a glossary, while Garden Flowers and Trees each have an index of Latin names. What a pity there is not one for Wild Flowers—anyone who wants to follow up his interest will need this. Otherwise, these are scholarly productions even though they are written for children, and their readers can go straight on from them to regular field guides.

The Young Naturalist's Handbook has been compiled and simplified from one such series. Its best feature is that it arranges material by habitat, which, for some reason, is usual only in dealing with the seashore, as in the Spotter's Guides. Here we have the seashore and six other topics, the last one being Cities and Parks.

Both text and pictures are clear and attractive, but the book tries to cover too much and ends up by being too selective. This would not in itself matter too much, but there are no directions for further study.

Giant among cricketers, an unfamiliar W. G. Grace stands out among other Gentlemen at Lord's in 1871. This is one of the many illustrations from the Neville Weston collection of Graciana which adorn the pages of Bernard Darwin's republished biography of the great man. ("W. G. Grace." By Bernard Darwin. Duckworth £5.95.) But by the time the engraving was made the youthful W. G. was already well on the way to becoming a legend—the boy who played for "all-England" at the age of 15 and was still playing half a century later at the outbreak of the First World War. As John Arlott recalls in his introduction, Darwin, grandson of the author of "Origin of Species" and golf correspondent of "The Times", was one of the few great sports writers, "a man of style, perception and clarity"—and wit. His understanding and appreciation of W.G., his insights into the life of the Grace clan, his pen-pictures of the great cricketers of the past are as fresh and as readable as ever. His biography is still worthy of a prominent place on the cricket-lover's bookshelf.

Science for fun

Weather. The Sea. Aeroplanes. Cars
Hart-Davis 95p each.
Fun with Physics. By Colin Siddons.
Kaye and Ward £2.25. 7182 1313 0.

To be able to give inquiring children accurate scientific information in a simplified form is a rare art. These five books, four forming part of a "questions answered" series (admirably translated from the original German), and the other by an experienced teacher, show exactly how it should be done.

Why is the sky blue? Who blows the wind? Where do rainbows come from? Clear coloured plates illustrate a text on Weather which, in relatively few words, provides satisfying explanations.

So it is with the companion books. The Sea deals with water-colours, tides, fish and diverse posers including "Why doesn't the sea overflow?" Transportation is also neatly encapsulated. The inevitable "how does a plane stay up?" is there, along with facts about controls and radar; the components of cars are clarified, along with basic ideas about horsepower and braking distances.

All-in-all this set of books is just the thing to attract searching minds, and much the same could be said about Fun with Physics. Using the simplest of apparatus (pins and needles, plasticine, corks, empty detergent bottles, and the like) Mr Siddons devises experiments that entertain and instruct. Water is shown to flow uphill, drinking ducks and pulse magnifiers are easily made, as are a flying saucer or a model dog who jumps on command from his kennel, and principles such as reflection, Newton's cradle, surface tension and electrostatics are exemplified. This very worthwhile contribution carries the hallmark of a first-class teacher.

Finding out

"Exploring" Series.
Science Museum/HMSO. 75p each.

The Science Museum, like its counterparts in South Kensington's museum-land, has a record of producing superb little books on topics which are the subjects of special exhibitions. The latest batch of six, tied in with the "Exploring" exhibition, are in the best vein of this tradition.

In a small space at a remarkably modest price, and making full use of both colour and black and white illustrations, each presents an introductory account of a topic at the forefront of current scientific interest, in a form ideal for use in schools. Nor do they depend on contact with the actual exhibition, although that, too, would be a valuable experience for any young student.

My own special interests led me to turn first to the booklet on Our Changing Climate. This is more up to date than almost any textbook, and covers the broad sweep of climatic change, historical changes, links with volcanic and solar activity, and the very latest evidence in support of the "Milankovich" theory.

The other five booklets, Man on the Moon, The Solar System, Mind and Body, Remote Sensing and Under the Sea, are all as well-presented and up to the minute. I was entertained and informed by every one; any scientifically minded secondary school student would lap them up.

Collectively and singly these books may be wholeheartedly recommended.

Simple Crafts. Edited by Doreen Ward.
Ward Lock £3.50. 7063 5542 3.

Save your old lolly sticks and get weaving! A simple harness made from 1" sticks appears in Weaving for Beginners and forms the basis for the instructions which follow. The loom can be two dowels or even a convenient doorknob and the book also describes a backstrap loom. Directions for threading and weaving are clearly presented and illustrated with photographs. It is a pity, however, that one of these shows a ruler with inches while the instructions are metric. Simple items to make include belts, bags and wallhangings and at the end of the book there are hints on finishing off and a glossary of terms.

A book on crochet in the same series also has photographic illustrations and might have been better with diagrams instead. The instructions are excellent and information about counting stitches and turning at the ends of rows, things which often cause problems for beginners. Items to make include scarves, potholders and a poncho; I particularly liked an amusing bookworm bookmark in twisted crochet.

Simple Crafts is a slightly misleading title. Although this book is allegedly for 11-year-olds upwards, some of the processes, such as bookbinding, furniture repairing and home decorating, are only suitable for adults. The book covers a wide range of crafts and is well illustrated, but the sections vary considerably in quality. The instructions for macramé, for instance, are well presented and easy to follow, while those for weaving are inadequate.

The use of pressed flowers is attractively shown but decorating candles is poorly illustrated. The excellent woodworking section presents toys and household items clearly and leatherworking is well described too; but the section on lamps and shades suffers from the fact that the numbering on the illustration does not match the text.

Fishy

Sea Angling. By Trevor Housby.
Wayland £2.95. 85340 488 7.

This book provides the young angler with a lot of valuable information about the species of fish to be caught along the coastline and the tackle necessary to catch them. Clearly written and well illustrated it should enable the tyro to set up his gear and identify any fish caught. As fishing is basically a war against nature there are useful tips about changing methods to match the type of locality and the weather, as well as species habitats. The introduction gives a timely warning about the danger to other people caused by flying hooks and leads when casting. Having had to do it, I would like to have seen a paragraph about the correct way to remove a hook from a human being. A useful book on the shelf of any young angler.

A fine song and dance

D. J. Hart reviews some travelling theatre shows

At this time of the year you might turn a corner in a shopping precinct or be wandering along a canal towpath or village road and come across a fine song and dance in the literal sense. In the West Midlands recently I have found three such travelling theatre groups—and a fourth, solo act in this year's spring festival in Cannon Hill Park in Birmingham. Twice daily a man called Lindbergh dived 60 feet into a narrow, six feet deep tank of flaming water.

Pentabus, whom I found in a shopping area in Kidderminster, are not as spectacular as that but they are in the same trade. Got up as the Latvegian State Dance and Theatre Company they performed a genuine escapology act, as well as a spoof of some folk-dancing followed by a mumming play given the same treatment.

Beginning in clear, bright sunshine the play had the wounded knight on his back attended by the doctor, when it was visited by a huge thunder storm. The actors made a quick dash to the nearby arcade and continued. Afterwards children insisted on talking to the dragon (actually a "gilbogel") when the actress playing him was trying to speak to them herself from under the great green head.

Mikron Theatre Company in a scene from 'I'd go back tomorrow'.

Like Pentabus, the Mikron company also performs in a variety of venues, but whereas the former has different shows for pubs and youth clubs, Mikron's base is a canal boat and their two shows each year take their stories from that way of life exclusively.

This year, between May and October, they will as usual travel almost 2,000 miles and give over 170 performances. Outside the Greyhound Inn at Longford, near Coventry, I saw them keep an audience of drinkers very happy with their show about the boatwomen's life, I'd go back tomorrow.

You die the death very fast in this business if you do not hold your audience's attention; spectators can simply walk away. People did not in the main abandon Forkbeard Fantasy when they appeared in The Precinct at Coventry, but around me there were some wry comments.

"They're nut cases, ain't they?", said one middle-aged woman, "they've let 'em out today. I bet they even get bloody paid for it an' all." An elderly man said, "Anybody can make a bloody fool of themselves, they're bloody crackers." I told Simon Britton, one of the four all-male group, that I would quote these comments and he laughed with the same affection which, I believe, was shown by the tone of voice in which they were spoken.

Unlike the other two groups, Forkbeard's personnel are not Equity members. They are visual artists. With their feet strapped to a structure made of small planks bolted together in two squares they gave us literally, as they call it, the British Square Dance.

I think they are injecting, with this and other inventions, an important imaginative dynamic. They are paid, but not much, and my parting moral is that funding bodies would do well to encourage more than they do these three groups and others like them.

Under the veneer

Jane Mercer reviews 'The Shout'

The Shout
Classic, Oxford Street and Warner West End, Leicester Square.

The Shout, Britain's entry in the 1978 Cannes Film Festival and winner there of a jury prize, is a genuine curiosity. Based on a story by Robert Graves, set in beautiful Devonshire countryside, and with an extremely distinguished cast of English actors, Alan Bates, John Hurt and Robert Stephens, the film's most marked characteristic is its un-Englishness.

There can be a particular pleasure and fascination in seeing ourselves and our idiosyncrasies through the eyes of an outsider, in this case the director of the film, expatriate Pole, Jerzy Skolimowski. An alien vision of what we hold most dear and most deeply (or indeed simply of what we are most used to) can, of course, also be very painful. At its best, though, it is both comic and moving, grotesque and revelatory.

Skolimowski has already demonstrated a taste and an ability for this kind of stance in Deep End, where that most unlikely background for passion, obsession and sudden death, the municipal swimming bath, was the chosen vehicle of surprise. In The Shout it is a village cricket match, the cliché of rural middle-class England, which in Skolimowski's hands beco arena for action which ca be described as a cross-b Grand Guignol and Gothic h

Car-issimus Plautus

Anthony Masters at Westminster School

Every two years, a quiet courtyard in the shadow of Westminster Abbey sees a sweetly incongruous spectacle. With a Queen Anne house as backdrop, a succession of city gents, tweed-skirted Margaret Rutherfords and trendy boys and girls come out to speak the deathless trimeters of Plautus and Terence. This, mirabile dictu, is the Westminster School Latin Play.

Plautus's Mostellaria seems expressly written to use as many characters as possible; most, including two of the leads, disappear after one scene. Slapdash dramaturgy, perhaps—but it makes a perfect showcase. Everyone gets his chance, and the visual translation of Plautine figures into modern ones—a hallowed Westminster tradition—proceeds with irrepressible invention. The slave Tranio (briskly played by Piers Higson Smith) pretends to his master's father that they have bought their elderly neighbour's house; what does the old man do while awaiting his conducted tour? He pulls out a certain financial journal, printed in Latin but still on pink paper.

This year's cast is outstanding; there is not one weak performance. Adam Blackburn's ingenuous Philolaches sailed through his marathon opening speech triumphantly, and his alert, resourceful sense of comedy made the famous eavesdropping scene a real delight. As his father, Francis Fitzgibbon, looking like a put-upon Rudyard Kipling, was both lovable and pathetic. Mark Gibbon as Callidamates, arriving at Philolaches' party in a battered Renault labelled "Car-issimus", played his drunk scene with an engaging craziness; and Arif Ali, sewn up in brown felt, made a lugubrious-looking hound who obviously had the household well under control.

As a special treat, the epilogue condensed a complete sequel into 60 seconds: Simo's wife appeared at last (Matthew Smith, armed with a rolling pin) and Tranio clinched the sale of the other house to the other old man. Maybe next year, when Plautus takes a rest, Theo Zinn could go further and commission his own Latin play, tailored to his cast's talents and his personal gift for visual drollery that spans the centuries.

Teaching Improvised Drama. By Peter Chilver.
Batsford £3.95. 7134 1036 1.

The most frequent question asked by inexperienced users of drama in schools is simply, "What can I do?". Peter Chilver's latest book, which is aimed, I imagine, principally at such teachers, offers a wealth of material and starting points for both what he calls "free" and "structured" improvisations.

After a lucid introduction to some of the basic features and functions of drama, he divides the book into material for younger and older students. Both sections cover a wide range of social, political and moral issues, drawing stimuli from court cases, biographies, newspapers, novels, science and history. The danger, as always, is that this "handbook" will be used as a manual of set lessons. This is best avoided by giving a clear idea of why drama should be used in the first place and the introduction provides some tentative and tantalizing suggestions.

Drama is seen as one of a small number of basic forms of expression alongside "lyric", "narrative" and "symposium". The prime content of drama is social action and its main function is to encourage children to consider and re-think attitudes and motives underlying behaviour. The selection of material and suggested questions for discussion and improvisation emphasize this direct involvement of drama in social and moral questions. In doing so the book implicitly promotes a more valuable conception of drama as a learning process than some other practical books with their lists of games, exercises, myths and legends.

The essence of good drama teaching does lie, I think, in the flexibility of the teacher in adapting material and structures to suit the objectives in hand. The implied value, therefore, of certain set lesson structures (class discussion: group improvisation: showing: discussion) and the emphasis on showing work to the whole class needs questioning and would certainly invite criticism from many practitioners. Nevertheless, the selective reader will find much to work from. The inexperienced teacher will benefit from the prodigious practical suggestions. The experienced teacher will be less satisfied.

Peter Chilver has thought widely and deeply about the functions of drama. The introduction is, in fact, a highly compressed version of a detailed analysis of the uses of drama in everyday life, as yet unpublished. Access to his thinking in this area would give the experienced teacher much more to bite on and perhaps set his growing number of practical publications in a useful context of theory.

A Midsummer Night's Dream.
Bubble Theatre. Touring London boroughs until September 2.

This is certainly not the first Punk Dream and I am sure it will not be the last. The vision of Theseus in glittering silver cat suit, armed with studs and clattering chains is a timely warning to anyone who thinks of Peaseblossom as a figment of the "Flower Fairy Book". Not a bit. The Bubble Theatre Company has a device to make all fit, in a one-noted, one-visioned, single-paced rant.

Judging by her dirty laughter, Theseus wooed Hippolyta with more than his sword. Every attempt is made to accentuate coarseness, whether hinted by, or absent from the text. And while it is perfectly reasonable for the lovers to strip when they enter the wood (as "reason and love" disintegrate in a cauldron of disruption and chaos), their rolling around in a first act threesome makes a nonsense of Hermia's later obsession with her chastity; it also makes utter nonsense of anything that happens between acts one and fin lovers are morally stripped we start.

Premature ending

Jim Anthony on geography programmes

ith Royal Ascot and Wimbledon minent, the BBC and the IBA ko their annual erroneous sumption that schols are on the rge of breaking up for summer lidays. On the contrary: many ddle schools have five or more eks' slog after the educational oadcasting year ends, and those hools with VCRs will begin to alize the real value of their vestment.

This reviewer has been stock- iling a range of tapes in what ght loosely be labelled town and untry studies (environmental is a -word for most eleven-year-olds) lled from this year's radio and levision output. The immediate pression on marshalling the terial is that the 12 to 16 age oup is well served with basic graphical material, but that the ddle school teacher who wishes introduce the concepts of onal or physical geography will e to borrow from the secondary ool output.

The Land (ITV) supplied, over terms, 20 excellent films on the diversities of the physical geography of Britain from the Lizard to the Cairngorms. Aimed at GCE/CSE classes, this series can be adapted for younger classes by dispensing with the commentary.

Location Britain (BBC-TV) offered five programmes this spring on regional geography for 13-16 year olds which were well within the scope of the top of the middle schol. The programme, on Peterhead, Merthyr Tydfil, Tynemouth, London Airport and Liverpool, will be repeated in the autumn term and are a useful source of contrasting examples of urban environments.

Established series such as Europe from the Air and Living in a Developing Country have soldiered on, repeating previous schedules, but an interesting newcomer for next year is Japan: the Crowded Islands (BBC-TV, summer term, 1979), five films made in cooperation with other European television companies. The emphasis is on human geography, with a Japanese family featured in each film and a chance to relate their way of urban and rural life to the remarkable population map of Japan.

"Geography is about maps but history is about chaps" as the saying has it, and chaps are obviously easier to portray in a radio programme than maps, so Exploration Earth has over the years always provided an interesting insight into the way the regular chaps and occasional maps are prseented. The raucous signature music, utterly unrelated to programme's content, has been annoying, but this term's unit of four programmes (BBC radio, Mondays 2 pm) on school visits has rung true for those intepid teachers who take middle school children out on extended environmental studies trips.

The four areas covered were Argyll, Swanage, The Weald and County Down. The reviewer's first hand experience of field studies at Swanage made this programme especially evocative. Seen through the eyes of Coventry schoolchildren, it provided an impressionistic skimming of the range of work available there for junior fieldworkers which was just sufficient to tempt the unwary teacher to organize his own visit.

Undeterred, or perhaps encouraged, by the lack of the visual dimension, this series offers a highly ambitious line-up next term as is indicated by the programme titles: The Nile, Everest, Cyclone in Bangladesh, Sahara Greenland and Challenger Deep.

In between the detailed physiographical and human geography series for the secondary schools and the bitty "I was there" approach at the younger end of the range, there seems to be considerable scope for two or three series for the top end of the middle school.

For example, television is in a uniquely advantageous position to acquaint the younger children with at least a flavour of the rural and urban landscapes of Britain which many of them will never see.

The dear old BBC series A Year's Journey, a sort of Down Your Way with pictures, might usefully be updated and resurrected. The visual factor in the vital skill of handling maps also cries out for television treatment. Near and Far (BBC-TV) nibbles at this with material on contours, but what is needed is at least half a dozen programmes on scales, bearings, conventional signs and colourings and the interpretation of maps.

There is also a clear need for a structured approach to field studies, dealing with the "nuts and bolts" of organization, and observation and recording techniques. But this raises the fundamentally important question of how much of the teacher's job should educational television do. Should it, with its unique powers of communication, provide a complete course of work, or should it offer material to supplement what children are already doing and stimulate more?

The process of conceiving and designing, manufacturing and supplying maintaining and improving artefacts fully, the challenges involved in that process and the skills required are not fully illustrated by the films, but could perhaps not be adequately explored in the 30 minutes they together devote to the subject. They may well awaken the interest of the sceptical viewer, but alone might not be sufficient to convince him that a reputable, rewarding, stimulating career can be found in engineering. Engineering is What You Make It, presented by William Woolard, is aimed at the O level and CSE student. It seeks thorough interviews with apprentices to demonstrate tha while work as a technician apprentice in the engineering industry is demanding, varied, and interesting, such people need not be intellectually brilliant. The principal message is that such careers are available to most people although, in making these points, there is a tendency in the film for each interviewee to explain his choice of career in engineering in terms of his (or her) desire to avoid careers in other aspects of engineering!

It is almost as if each of those interviewed is content with his "lot", having avoided a "lower level" engineering job. The sceptical viewer (and for these films these are the only important viewers) might therefore question the logic of the argument which states that most jobs in engineering are interesting, stimulating and creative, given the evidence that engineering seems to provide for a distinct hierarchy of jobs with incumbents at each level expressing satisfaction with their role, but apparently having sought to avoid the requirements and characteristics of the job below.

The avoidance of "doing" seems to be a source of satisfaction for the technician, while the avoidance of the solely internal manufacturing role seems to be a source of satisfaction to the business technician apprentice. Use of terms like "taking the plung into engineering", perhaps reinforces a view that the choice involved a certain amount of risk and might meet with a certain amount of disapproval. References to Concorde, the Jaguar XJS, the London taxi, military vehicles and pollution control all help in making the points. The points, however, are not clearly made.

Engineering Matters—or the Continuing Story of Og adopts a different style and offers a slightly different message. Here, the focus is upon the professional—graduate—engineer. Most references are to the petro-chemical industry, and therefore to design, construction, commissioning and maintenance—not perhaps the mainstream of engineering activity.

Beginning with a cartoon story concerning the invention of the wheel, the film goes on to consider the essential skills of the engineer. There are extensive references to Brunel (Junior), in particular to his SS Great Britain. This is offser against a description of the engineering work associated with Concorde, also in the Bristol area.

It is ironical that, whilst both of these were undoubtedly major engineering achievements, both were commercial failures. Again, engineers are described as innovators and managers. Misconceptions are exposed and engineering jobs described very much in the context of project engineering and management. Here we see graduate, professional engineers getting dirty.

The message that engineering is to do with conceiving, designing, making, commissioning, using and maintaining, in this case process plant. Passing reference to other artefacts, large and small, broadens the picture, but the impression remaining is one of the engineer creating process plant and being dwarfed by his creations. Again a contribution, in this case a very convincing one, but nevertheless incomplete.

Incomplete pictures, somewhat confusing messages, and rather limited examples, all brought together in rather self-conscious attempts to convey important messages for a perhaps willing but still sceptical audience.

Anorexia

Sir,—I would be ungracious to criticise Sue Lynas's review of the 16mm colour film Sharon—An Anorexia Nervosa Case History (TES May 26) since it was full positive and on the whole accurate, but there are a few points of detail I feel require to be filled in.

Miss Lynas rightly noted that the film won a silver award in the medical category of the British Sponsored Film Festival, but in contrast to other entries she mentioned she failed to point out that the film was made by the Audio-Visual Aids Unit of the University of Bristol. Messrs Farley Health Products were the sponsors, not the makers of the film.

The case history of Sharon as related by Miss Lynas makes it appear that the girl's period of study in the drama department of the University of Bristol was the primary cause of her problems. I do not believe that the film actually claims this to be the case but only points out that the irregular working hours in the drama department were a subsidiary cause of her anorexia nervosa.

The fact that the film was made within the drama department, of which the AVA Unit is a consistent part, and the intention behind the making of it was pastoral in the widest sense: helping Sharon herself to gain deeper insight into her psychological mechanisms and using the case history, wity her full agreement, to help others in a similar predicament. While it would be presumptuous to assert that both objectives have been realized in full I think it is necessary to place the making of the film in a somewhat different light from that cast by Miss Lynas's review.

One final point. Miss Lynas claims the film is too short and that there should be another two films to do a thorough analytic and clinical job. I beg to differ in that the current film precisely accomplishes the very limited objectives it set itself; there is every reason to think that the making of two further films on the subject is still not only possible but highly desirable.

GEORGE BRANDT,
Head of department and Director of Film Studies,
